Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," K. G. Ingersoll, p. 5.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION. A discussion between Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. The opposing principles are herein stated clearly and briefly. Valuable to those who want to possess the arguments of both sides of the question. Price 15 cents. "Life and Health, or How to Live a Century," by the same author. Price, 10 cents. "A Lecture on Religious, Political and Social Freedom." Price, 5 cents. A set, one of each, for 25 cents.

Horrors of Modern Matrimony As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; receipts for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Bear all sides, then decide." 23 chapters; 478 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eye-witnesses, the threats of mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the 'exposures' disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.25, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 368 pages. Price, 60 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgusted religionists. The necessity for separate organization and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"Loma" -A CITIZEN OF VENUS," by Prof. Wm. Windsor. A story of surpassing interest, largely devoted to Sexologic and Sociologic problems. Like Bellamy in his "Looking Backward," the writer of "Loma" believes in the "state," as a factor in social evolution, but individualists will probably forgive this feature for the sake of the radically revolutionary ideas in regard to popular theories—sexologic, theologic, cosmologic, etc. Substantially printed and artistically bound. Price, post-paid, $1.50. Address this office.

PERSONAL A well-educated, broad minded, liberal lady, neat in person, well preserved, not far from seventy years young—alone in the world, living in an orthodox village, wishes to correspond with single gentlemen, healthy, liberal, of excellent habits, neither poor nor rich, of about the same age. The years do not make us old so much as our thoughts. With good, clean habits and sound heredity the limit of life should not be under 85 or 90. Willing to go to any of Uncle Sam's new possessions to begin life and grow up with the country. All first letters may be directed to "M," care of Lucifer.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 20 cts per dozen.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 15 cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. II., No. 44. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, NOVEMBER 5, E. M. 298. [C. E. 1898.] WHOLE No. 735

Riches.

Freedom the wood-nymph in a marsh found
A gilded asp, with glittering jeweled crest
And eyes of light. So gracefully it coiled,
With rainbow shimmer playing o'er its gold,
That Freedom, charmed, took up the lissome toy
And let it coil about her sloping wrist,
And span her neck, and make its pliant nest
Among the curves of her youthful bosom.
For what should white-armed Freedom dream of ill!
Now lies she low, a purple-spotted corpse,
Poisoning the air, dead without sign of wound.
But those that nearer drew tell how they saw
A mark as of a tooth above the spot
Where once beat freedom's heart.

Harry Lyman Koopman.

The Relation of Religion to Conservatism and Hypocrisy.

BY E. C. WALKER.

Rev. Sidney Holmes deprecates the use of so much of Lucifer's space in the discussion of religious questions. He began this particular debate by consuming nearly three columns in the effort to rewrite the religionist's theory of the history of the church and of the relation of the church to reaction and progress. I had let pass Mr. Kerr's attempt to perform a like miracle. To date, each of Mr. Holmes' articles has been longer than my one article.

I repeat that the church is an organization whose main purpose is either to maintain the status quo by antagonizing the tendencies to differentiation, to change, or to hark back to earlier types of belief, moral sanction and polity. By its very constitution it is always conservative when it is not reactionary, which more often happens. It posits a revelation from a perfectly good, all-wise and an all-powerful god as the source of its principles and the warrant for its authority to teach and to command. Thus it is necessarily hostile to whatever is not recorded or approved in that "revelation." Thus it becomes, whenever it has the power, the persecutor of whoever blasphemes its god by doubting or denying any of the dogmas which it asserts constitutes its Word. Thus it hinders development by holding men at least outwardly loyal to ideals that have been outgrown, to hypotheses and institutions that no longer represent the widest knowledge and best aspirations of mankind. Thus it makes men hypocrites by rewarding their subserviency and stupidity and punishing their independence and mental alertness.

It is not a sufficient answer to say that the man who actively participates or passively acquiesces in the invasions of which his church is guilty would be inclined to do the same things if he were not in the church. The church gives him the opportunity, the sanction of numbers, the protection of its mighty power, and does all it can to stimulate his belief that he is doing God's work in making his fellows miserable. It is in this case, as in the case of the state—the individual's natural tendency to bigotry, tyranny and spoliation is intensified and sanctified when exercised in the name of, and for the benefit of, recognized authority. Crimes that he could not commit as a mere man, as a private citizen, he can commit with impunity as a churchman or as an official. His nature may not "be changed by the church" or by the state, but its better elements are choked into inactivity, its worst elements are stimulated into noxious vigor.

Yes, I have sought "to expose the narrowness of some of the self-styled Freethought advocates"; I have repeatedly shown that they are only whitewashed religionists, acceptors of that baleful principle of imposed authority for which the church has ever stood as a rock; I have shown that while they have rejected a few of the tenets of the church they have inherited its spirit of invasion; that they would now do in the name of morals or of temperance what the church did in the name of God and of God's morals—in a word, that while they take the name of Freethinker, they have no conception that the fundamental principle of freethought is liberty, freedom to investigate and to accept or reject as the testimony gives warrant to our individual minds.

Mr. Holmes is at times delightfully humorous. He wants to know why all reforms in religion have come from within the church instead of without the church. The reason is obvious—they have not come in that way. To be sure, for a long time all the questioning there was came from within, but why? Because there was no without. "Accept the teachings and authority of the church or be exterminated." That was the dictum. As Kingdon Clifford said, in substance: "Men destroy your house and all your other buildings, erect a wretched hut on the ruins, and then take credit to themselves for all the shelter there is about the premises." That was what the church did in the world of thought in Europe. So Luther was necessarily a Catholic; nowhere outside of that church could his abilities have been utilized. But, mind you, the evils he assailed were the direct and inevitable outgrowths of the authoritarianism and the dogmas that are the essentials of religion; the man in a measure revolted against the churchman. As to Bruno and Galileo, their inspiration and their work lay outside of, and was therefore hostile to the creed and polity of the church. They were investigators of nature, and in the effort to do the work they most liked they found themselves hampered and thwarted by the Bible and its official interpretation by the church, and at last one was forced to deny his discoveries and the other was burned. The twelve years' imprisonment of Roger Bacon because of his persistency in studying chemistry is one of the million answers of the church to Mr. Holmes' belated claim that it is self-reforming. But it is when we come to the distinctly modern period, the period that has witnessed the most marked change in the preaching and practice of the church, that we see how very little it is which the church has done to reform itself. The two great agencies are the so-called higher criticism and evolutionary science. The higher criticism is simply an amplification and further demonstration of the researches and criticisms of Thomas Paine, and this amplification and further demonstration have been made possible by forces which the church cursed and sought to nullify in their beginnings, such, to illustrate, as archæology, and the comparative, scientific study of mythology, religion and language. As for evolutionary biology, which has scooped the very foundations from under the doctrines of the creation of man, the fall, the atonement—the whole "scheme of salvation"—we who live today know for ourselves how bitterly the church has contested every inch of its advance and still contests it in all the obscure corners and darkened brains where it yet has power to sway the thoughts of men.

The fewer he shows the men to be who wrought havoc through the inquisitions and the more kindly the dispositions of the vast majority of the religionists, the more effectively does Mr. Holmes assist in demonstrating that it was religion acting through its working organ, the church, that did the terrible mischief, not the untrained impulses of humankind, as he is vainly trying to prove. Mr. Holmes should know that we admit the intense sincerity of many of the worst inquisitors; that we admit they were good men in intention, but became bad men in results because they did believe their atrocious cruelties would preserve the church, save their souls and the souls of those they loved. The false doctrines were what was wrong and the church existed to conserve the false doctrines.

The church is no "imaginary monster"—the church is a compact organization, having name, mission and vast wealth to protect and perpetuate. "Witches" existed only in the imaginations of believers; the church is a great power which oppresses and robs entirely independent of Mr. Holmes' nonbelief and of my belief in its existence. And it is the firm support of the other oppressors and robbers, the state and state-defended monopoly. It was the great Catholic Winchorst, I think, who said: "Religion must be preserved for the people, for if it be taken away from them they will rebel." And the business of the church is to preserve religion.

I can assure Mr. Holmes that the average Freethinker knows far better "what the Bible really says" than does the average Christian, and the greater confidence of the layman in the minister is usually based on nothing more substantial than his own ignorance of the Bible coupled with the reverence for "the cloth," which was in his youth made a part of his emotional equipment.

Of course we want "a careful study of the Bible," but when did the church ever encourage such study, if there was a chance that it would be thoroughly impartial, like the study of a work not claimed to be divine? The church exists to promote belief independent of the results of investigation, not belief dependent upon investigation.

I repeat, "The church makes men bad by making them hypocrites." "Cowardice and narrow self-interest makes men hypocrites," counters Mr. Holmes. To escape starvation a man steals, but if he is in danger of starvation because he has been robbed of his earnings and monopoly denies him the opportunity to work for bread, is it not correct to say that monopoly made him steal? Why do men conceal their opinions or actively profess opinions they do not hold? Is it not because observation or experience has taught them they may be made to suffer if they stand by their convictions? The church has tortured and killed millions of men for standing by their principles, and we know that even today in this land the church does all it can to make it uncomfortable for the doubter or denier of her creeds. Men yield in terror of her implied or expressed threats or of her actual ostracism or violence. Thus the church does make men bad by making them hypocrites, else cause and effect are myths and human language a meaningless jabber. Who said there was no hypocrisy caused by threats and oppression other than the threats and oppression of the church? Certainly I said nothing of the kind. The shaft of "you're another," fired by Mr. Holmes at government and Grundy can not be transformed into a shield to guard the heart of the church; it does not follow that I hold a brief for them because I appear against the church.

False belief is a garment that may be outgrown, and when outgrown it can and should be laid off. Unfortunately, many who come out on to the road that leads upward and onward forget to cast aside the garments that have become too small for them, so they go along the highway toward the new with the rags and tatters of the old clinging to them and moving the wonder of their observant fellow travellers.

To say that the church does not make men either good or bad in actions is to say that belief has no influence on conduct, which is absurd. Why does the Catholic not eat meat on Friday? Why is the Saturday-keeper persecuted?

COMMENT BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

I feel certain Brother Walker will admit that no religious organization in this country now would approve the burning of a heretic at the stake.

"Some of them would if they had the legal right to do so," he may reply.

By "some of them" he would then mean some individual men, and no religious organization in America has enough such men to permit such a proceeding. That religious people under the same conditions which existed several hundred years ago would burn heretics, I admit. So would Brother Walker and myself, in all probability—almost to a certainty—eat human flesh under the conditions in which our ancestors were cannibals.

I do not blame Walker because his ancestors were cannibals. Neither should he hold the religious people of today responsible for the burning of Bruno. He is a believer in cause and effect. The acts and beliefs of churchmen are effects of inheritance, environment and imperfect education—of ignorance, in other words. The way to get rid of the effect is to remove the cause. That can be done, in this case, only by enlightenment of the intellect.

That is all the issue there is between Walker and myself on this church question. He seems to think the best way to cure people of superstition is to denounce it and tell them it is detrimental to progress. I think a better way is to show them its incompatibility with reason. Superstition thrives under denunciation, but reason kills and destroys it.

It is all right to resist aggression even by those who honestly believe they are justified in aggression. But if the aggressors are really honest men—and I am one who believes the majority of churchmen are at least as honest as the majority of freethinkers—the best way to effectually put an end to the aggression is to show the aggressors that it really is an aggression. To Walker it is clear that the churchmen are aggressors, but he should remember that very few, if any, churchmen see all things from his viewpoint. In fact, it is likely there are some freethinkers, besides myself, who do not.

Who Were the Pioneers—Who Wrote the Platform?

BY FRANCIS BARRY.

Claims and counter claim have been made in Lucifer, and in this communication I must be understood as making no dispute, but as giving independent testimony. Much of the work that has been done for freedom has been done in private, or semi-publicly. An account of this must be deferred till "the great day of reckoning."

Probably no one is better entitled be called a pioneer than the poet Shelley. At any rate, whatever early and good work others may have done, there is no danger of that bright and brave boy getting too much love and admiration.

The mere mention of Mary Wolstonecraft will suggest to the readers of Lucifer more of thought and emotion than any words of mine.

Unquestionably the pioneer of social freedom in this country was Frances Wright. I have read a volume of her lectures on the religion humbug, delivered in 1830. The exact date of her lectures on marriage I cannot give. Stephen Pearl Andrews told me this anecdote of her: She had given a public lecture in favor of affectional freedom, when one of the smart gentlemen arose in the audience and inquired if it was to be understood that according to the doctrine of the lecture he would have a right at their hotel to invite the lecturer to share his room and bed. "Certainly," was the reply, "and I should have equally a right to decline, as I most assuredly should." Here is a "bravo," and a doffed hat for the woman who went through the country talking that way nearly seventy years ago.

Of the early workers no one is better deserving of honorable mention than Mary Gove Nichols.

Among the ablest writers on the general question it is safe to name Stephen Pearl Andrews and John Patterson, Edgeworth Lazarus and F. L. Nichols made, I think, the best arguments in favor of non-exclusive love.

C. M. Overton was, in his best days, the sharpest writer in the reform ranks. He brought to bear, with withering effect, his unequal sarcasm, upon the humbug and heathenism of the marriage institution.

Victoria Woodhull was, for a time, the most successful agitator of the marriage question,

Several of the early writers, such as Warren names, did masterly work in the way of making papers that cover the whole ground, but it remained for a LUCIFER contributor to say, in the fewest words, just what we mean, and just what the public needs to know.

Several years ago Lizzie M. Holmes wrote as follows: "The fight social reformers are making, is not what woman must do with her freedom when she gets it; not whether she shall have many lovers, or one, or none at all; not whether she ought to have one child, or a dozen, or none; not whether she should care for them exclusively or not, but that her right to choose for herself be generally recognized."

I do not forget Moses and Lillian Harman, Juliet Severance and E. C. Walker. They are workers of whom we are justly proud, and in whose work we are happy and exultant, but I award first premium on platform to Lizzie M. Holmes.

Comments on Correspondents.

BY C. F. HUNT.

Mr. C. L. James informs us (in English) that the two following ideas are not contradictory:

1st. Divorce value from a commodity to get an invariable unit of value.

2d. Value apart from commodity is inconceivable.

Or, if contradictory, they only show that a writer may properly change his opinion as to fact, within the limits of a small book. Then Mr. James drops into his native Latin and says I ought to learn certain things, but does not explain that an "elenchi" is one of the machines which Bill Nye invented to enable a syndicate of sages to think vast thoughts into a hopper, then retail them. The other long term is a zoological term. I once met one in the woods and remember thinking what queer things we see when we have no gun.

Mr. W. G. Thorland evidently thinks the way to answer a criticism is to repeat the matter criticised. Concerning Redbeard's book, I pointed out that the strongest men are not the fittest, and that they are liable to be overcome by a weakling armed with modern means of combat. These points, though self-evident, are ignored. It may be that a reading of such an illogical book impairs the power to reason.

I notice that Redbeard has a letter in "The Eagle and Serpent" which is dated "University of Chicago." It is needless to say that such institution has no such "LL. D." nor does the name appear in the Chicago directory. No LL. D. would retain the title while using a pseudonym. No LL. D. moreover would admit in the preface of his work that it contains many errors. He would correct the errors. But this "LL. D." expects the errors to be discovered by critics, and then in a later edition he can manage to get up a rather decent sort of book as regards scholarship, but he should share honors with the critics. I want credit for discovering that appalling combination, "Carnivorous combat." It is to be feared that when the blunders are all rectified, the pretensions and fallacies of the book will be so apparent that fame and fortune for the author will be as far away as ever.

"The Truth Seeker" has found the truth, and announces it (October 8), viz: "Talmage is incapable of telling the truth." This throws light on a sermon by Talmage on life insurance, which an insurance company has printed for the use of agents. Joseph told Pharoah to save the fifth part of his crops for the seven years of famine, and this Talmage calls life insurance, and we therefore know that it is not, but is ordinary saving which all can do for themselves.

Rev. Talmage cites Paul who says, Anyone who provides not for his own household is worse than an infidel, but says: "It is meanly selfish for you to be so absorbed in the Heaven to which you are going that you forget what is to become of your wife and children after you go." Infidels are all going to Heaven, because worse men than they are going; unless this logic is too severe for Christian doctrine.

Rev. Talmage continues: "'Oh,' says some one, 'I have more faith than you; I believe that when I go out of this world the Lord will take care of my family.' Yes, He will provide for them [sneers Talmage]. Go to Blackwell's Island, go through all the poor houses in the country, and I will show you how often God provides for the neglected children of neglectful parents."

"Truth Seeker" go to! Talmage has spoken the truth!

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ASSOCIATION. The first step, after having decided upon a plan, is to form a joint stock company or corporation, with a selected council or board of trustees, whose duty it will be to organize the industrial operations and to make all necessary arrangements on behalf of the association.

From the very first, all the operations of the association should be upon the principles of organized co-operative industry. The details of the mode of organization are so vitally important that I shall make definite suggestions of what I believe to be a practicable plan, and of considerations which should not be neglected. These considerations will indicate how far modifications may be safely made to meet the wants of an individual association. My limits will not permit adequate explanation of reasons.

It makes no difference who form the plan or select the company; for if it fails to be accepted by persons having the requisite capital and labor to contribute, it will simply be rejected and become necessary to draw up a different plan which will be acceptable. In order to succeed, not only must sufficient capital and labor be contributed in the beginning, but there must be sufficient inducement to insure its continuous contribution, so that no matter who withdraw, others will be glad to supply their places, both with capital and skillful labor.

A Suggestion.

Your "Pilot House Observations" in Light Bearer, No. 73 are timely. I was positive something of this sort would come shortly from the able pen of the pilot.

If this letter can be given space, I would make this suggestion: Let the editor of the Light Bearer state about what additional expense would be incurred in adding say one or two more sheets to the publication each week; such additional expense to be borne by all who wish to enter the arena to air their thoughts. I will head the list with five dollars. Speak out, brethren.

WILLIAM SCHEMENOUR.

Waterville, Ohio.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, 51 Arundel Square, London, N., England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

AT DATE of going to press (Oct. 31) we have received no news of the Bedborough trial, which was to come up at the Old Bailey, Oct. 24.

AT THIS WRITING—Oct. 31, the editor is believed to be pretty decidedly convalescent, though still very weak. Propped up in bed he writes or dictates letters and a few short editorial comments. With care it is hoped he will soon be able to resume his accustomed place in Lucifer's office.

Memorial for Labor's Martyrs.

The graves of August Spies, Albert R. Parsons, George Engel and George Fischer, who were judicially murdered in Chicago eleven years ago, and of Louis Lingg whose tragic death in his cell a few days before the hanging of his comrades gave rise to a well founded belief that he also was murdered, will be decorated November 11 by a committee from the Labor Martyrs' Association of Chicago.

Memorial services will be held the evening of the same day in Twelfth Street Turner Hall, Chicago. It is well known that none of the Chicago daily papers published in the English language will give either a full or fair report of these meetings. The speakers are to be Dr. Morris Schultz, in German, and C. L. James in English. The latter is a well known contributor to Lucifer and to other papers devoted to the cause of social freedom. What Mr. James writes is always well worth reading and what he will say in his speech in memory of these victims of murderous capitalists will not be less so.

In order to satisfy a demand for a truthful account of this memorial meeting it has been decided to devote the issue of Lucifer of Nov. 19 almost entirely to a report of its proceedings. Mr. James' speech will be printed in full, or nearly so, and a translation of Dr. Shultz's remarks will be published, if it is to be obtained. Summaries of the remarks of others who may speak will also be given.

The issue of Lucifer containing this report will be almost unsurpassed for effectiveness in the libertarian propaganda and it should be widely distributed. In order that it may be given the widest circulation and do the most possible good, extra copies will be printed which will be sent by mail postage paid for 1 cent a copy in bundles of twenty-five copies, or ninety cents for 100 copies. For those who think they can not make use of twenty-five copies we will send one dozen copies for fifteen cents.

Persons desiring bundles of this special edition of Lucifer should send in their orders without delay, so we can know how many extra copies to print. It ought to be an easy matter to place twenty-five copies where good results will follow. It should be remembered that the great mass of the people have never learned the facts of the judicial murder, of 1887. The time is ripe to inform them. Many a convert to the cause of individual liberty may be made by taking advantage of this opportunity to distribute up-to-date literature on the subject.

How many extra copies shall we print? It depends on the orders we receive in advance. Those who delay in ordering until after the paper is printed may not be able to get extra copies. The forms will be closed Nov. 12 and all orders should be sent before that date if possible.

Sympathy for Austrian Women—Peasant and Empress.

Louis J. Livingston writes from Cleveland, Ohio, as follows:

"In one of the recent Lucifers you ask for the names of persons to whom to send sample copies. For the sake of the cause I enclose a list of very desirable persons, but with the understanding that you send them no copy containing such an insult to womanhood and humanity as your defense of the assassination of the late Empress of Austria, who was, in private life really a Freethinker, under a thin coating of Catholicism, and one of the kindest, most charitable, most liberal-minded, as well as the most pathetically unfortunate women who ever sat upon a throne.

"It was the Catholic church who removed her, through one of its assassins, who, for its vile purposes now masquerade as anarchists. This fact becomes more apparent now that it has leaked out that the old Emperor, himself a really liberal and kind man, and an unwilling tool of the church, is looking about for a young princess to breed a successor to the only throne that remains of any value to His Holiness. Remember, too, that of all the outrages committed by so-called anarchists, none of the victims have been dignitaries of the church, and the institution and its representatives are singularly free from such attacks. It was the church itself that drove the empress from her home and followed her to her tragic end, because, in spite of her formal allegiance to it, she was too liberal and high-spirited to become its abject tool."

COMMENTS.

I have had some warm commendations of the short article in regard to the recent assassination of the Empress of Austria, as printed in No. 729, and this is the first expression of contrary opinion that has been received. I have just re-read carefully the condemned article, and fail to see the justice or truthfulness of our friend's criticism; and I doubt very much if any reader except Mr. Livingston, saw a defense of assassination in my remarks. On the contrary, their drift was rather to show the futility of such methods. I did not condemn Luccheno, neither did I condemn the Empress, personally. They are respectively types of the classes to which they did and do belong. With the life or opinions of the Empress, as stated by our friend, I am totally unacquainted. I only know of her as a representative of the parasitic class—the exploiter class, the governing class—in short, of the feudal lord class, the wholesale robber class. If a Freethinker, that fact has nothing to do with the case, as I see it. Many a Freethinker or heretic in religion is just as much attached to the prevailing system of exploitation of the many by the few as are the churchmen themselves. If she was charitably inclined, that fact speaks something for her personal merit; but it is doubtful if it does not make her a greater enemy, really, to the poor than if she had been a hard-hearted tyrant. The chief effect of charity from the rich is to fasten more firmly the present iniquitous system upon the poor by making them more patient under it.

I do not blame the Empress, as I said before, because, whether good or bad, she could not, under her environment, be other than she was. The same, of course, must also be said of Lucchino, or Lucchesi, as he is sometimes called.

As to whether the Catholic church is in any way responsible for the bloody deed I am wholly ignorant. If Mr. Livingston is in possession of facts which warrant his assertion he should, in the interest of truth and of freedom, publish those facts to the world.

In a recent issue of the "New York World" is an article of great interest, as showing the conditions in Austria, and on Continental Europe generally, that naturally produce such tragedies as that which lately occurred in Switzerland. If these women bod-carriers are not wholly besotted, wholly bestialized or brutalized, they must, at some time of their lives, feel hateful, revengeful, even murderous, towards the class that lives in ease and splendor on the fruits of their unrequited toil, their disinherit lives, their worse than savage slavery. What more natural, then, that these consciously wronged, these murderously-inclined women should occasionally give birth to a murderer—foredoomed as such by prenatal conditions or impressions? As ye sow, so also shall ye reap." "He that soweth the wind must reap the whirlwind."

The following paragraphs are clipped from the "World's" article alluded to:

Millions of money are being spent on the palace which is being built for the Imperial family—the unhappy Hapsburgs.

Every modern art will contribute to its beauty; every luxury that unlimited wealth can buy will here surround the lonely man who mourns his murdered wife, the children of his gloomy, splendid home.

Austrian women are mixing the mortar for the palace, are carrying it in heavy tubs balanced upon their heads, straining and tugging up endless inclines, with starting eyes and panting breaths—mere human beasts of burden, from whose whipcord muscles and leathery faces nearly every trace of womanly beauty, of femininine softness has vanished.

Austrian men—well, Austrian men are watching the work.

In America one or two watchmen would do this, as hod-hoisting machines would relieve strong men of the work of the tugging of mortar and bricks, which is here women's work.

Sitting in sight of the new palace is a company of men—soldiers. They are able-bodied young fellows, the pick of the army which is the pick of the country.

They sit on a long bench. They watch the women carry mortar. It is very tiresome.

From time to time the officer of the guard shouts a loud command, when, with clanking arms, the men rise to salute some brass-bound officer, who haughtily acknowledges the honor.

This is men's work—in Vienna.

There are 60,000 men doing such work as this in the capital, while the women carry hods. In the dual Empire there are 2,000,000, counting the reserves of all sorts, some of whom do work at the arts of peace between whiles.

Now there is an unusal commotion among the soldiers at the palace. A drummer beats a queer, ancient-sounding drum measure. Civilians take off their hats. A carriage whirls past, in which a gray-haired man, erect and soldierly, salutes the civilians, the soldiers, and gazes proudly at the lofty palace he is rearing to the pride of a stricken house and the glory of a doomed nation.

He doesn't salute the women who toil with straining muscles at his mortar tubs. He does not see them. He is Franz Josef, the Emperor.

No one in Vienna sees anything incongruous in all this or realizes that these women are building a monument to mediævalism.

They receive forty cents a day for their work. They are fortunate. There have been people who have builded monuments for no pay but the lash.

The women mortar-mixers, "by special appointment," work in the dark hours before dawn, for there must be a good supply of mortar for the Emperor's palace, and women are plenty and masons impatient.

About eight o'clock they pause for breakfast, reading meanwhile the newspaper in which their black bread and horsemeat sausage were wrapped.

Breakfast is soon past, and the climbing up steep inclines with tubs of mortar on their heads begins again and continues until noon. Two hours are allowed for dinner. With the strength recruited by more black bread and horsemeat sausage and a nap, the day's work is carried on till dark.

Then the laborer becomes a housewife and cooks the only warm meal of the day.

The laborers begin as young girls, assisting the men, and heaven only knows how much they earn.

They do the fetching and carrying, bringing beer and tools, clearing up after the men's work is over.

In time they take their places as able-bodied laborers on buildings and public works in digging drains and laying pipe and pavements.

Degraded to the level of the roughest men, these women pass days of unremitting toil.

Their arms are bare, their heads covered by folded kerchiefs tied under the chin. A little pad of cloth on the top of the head keeps the tub of mortar from brushing the scalp.

The woman laborer wears a rough waist, free and loose; a skirt, not much below the knee; no stockings, and low-heeled half shoes, of the sabot order.

This dress is common to all the laboring women, whether busy on the palace of the Emperor, digging in the streets, burdened with an enormous square basket of washing, or harnessed to a wagon together with the dog, hauling great loads along the streets.

And then there are the idle, lounging, arrogant officers, who strut and swagger through the streets or sit lounging in the cafes, ogling the ladies as they pass, killing time, since there is no other slaughter to be done, with soldiers to wait upon them, so that their idle hours may not be burdened by any work heavier than turning the files of the comic papers.

Is it not a contrast?

Who Was James Young Babcock?

Was he a man who wanted to see the world from the tramp's viewpoint? Or was the dead man himself a tramp who had stolen James Young Babcock's belongings? A correspondent sends us the following clipping from a Vermont paper, and we reproduce it, thinking it possible that the dead man's friends may thus learn of his fate. We know nothing of him. The reporter's conclusion that the "Legitimation League" was "an unlawful business" is quite amusing. The dispatch is headed, "A Mystery. An Unknown Man Mangled on the Canadian Pacific Railway:"

Vancouver, B. C., October 18.—Who is James Young Babcock? Three weeks ago, while stealing a ride on a C. P. R. freight near North Bend, B. C., he fell to the track and the wheels cut off his head and right arm. The official report at the time was "Unknown, presumably a tramp, killed while stealing a ride on a freight train." The only effects on the man was a well worn, dirty valise. The unknown was ragged himself. Only a tramp, the railway officials thought, so the valise was laid aside unnoticed till the cornorer's inquest developed a startling state of affairs. Inside the dirty valise was a suit of stylish clothing, a traveling toilet case, such as might be used by a fashionable gentleman, an unmounted photograph of two beautiful girls about 14 and 16 years old, and most interesting of all, a pocket notebook with the name Jas Young Babcock upon it and inside a newspaper clipping account of a trial of Geo. Bedborough for carrying on the unlawful business known as the "Legitimation League," in which the names of Mrs. Zelenia Harman and Mr. Barnard appear.

The Opposition—Tactics of Our Friends, the Enemy.

In a recent Light Bearer is a letter from Albina L. Washburn, one of the best-known reform workers in Colorado, telling our readers of her proposed trip to California, and asking for names of those living on her line of travel who would like to hear her lectures on reform subjects, and especially on the "Labor Exchange." Mrs. Washburn is the pioneer worker in the Labor Exchange gospel in Colorado, having for many years carried on an Exchange at Loveland, also at Fort Collins and at Denver.

At Loveland and Collins Mrs. Washburn has been an active and outspoken friend and agent of our little "Morning Star." She has obtained for us quite a number of subscribers and distributed many hundreds of samples, with the usual result of meeting with much unfair opposition. The following letter written for the "Loveland Leader," more than six years ago, explains to some extent the tactics of the enemies of our Light Bearer:

EDITOR LEADER: A few day since I received by mail a copy of "The Leader" which contained an article to which my attention was called by several enclosing pencil marks. The communication, signed "X. X.," was headed "Does Not Like the Paper." Just why the paper is sent me, or by whom, I do not know, but suppose it may be to invite a few remarks in behalf of a benighted public.

The thought that strikes me first would doubtless occur to others, after reading this kindly warning, that "there has been circulated in our communitity a number of copiee of a vile sheet, issued from some filthy cesspool of Topeka joarnalism, which would make a fit subject for official investigation by the postal authorities." Why does the writer not give the name of the paper, its editor, origin and reason for being? If, as is asserted further, "the paper is an obscene and vicious publication," if it "has a local contributor" and "agent," why not tell about it that we may avoid this pernicious sheet, or if need be, secure "official investigatiou."

Furthermore, why will not the correspondent sign his own name to so apparently friendly a warning in the interest of public welfare? Thinking people rarely like to take the word absolute from a person unknown, hiding behind a nom de plume. They have a right to judge for themselves of the reliability of the writer and how far such expressed opinion would probably be indorsed by their own. Readers are aware that sometimes mistakes are made; people may be blinded by passion, by prejudice, or by ignorance. To say that the paper is devoted to the cause of "free love" and is "consequently opposed to any code of morals" is to me an astonishing statement, and those who understand "free love" to mean in its purity the very opposite of free lust, would certainly take exceptions to such a misleading use of terms. That it demands the absolute freedom of speech and of the press, may be said of so many papers nowadays edited by brainy, progressive men and women as to cause one to wonder if "X. X." can be some modern Rip Van Winkle just rubbing his eyes after a long nap, waking to find that the earth is round and not flat and "does move" besides. Also "it asserts that there is nothing too obscene to be published." Can it be possible? A bold paper if this be true, and one to avoid.

Yet, where can we pick up a common daily or weekly political paper but we are met by obscene stories, hints, advertisements and jokes? So, which of the many is the awful paper which, if it does not assert this privilege, acts upon it. And "no regard for chastity either!" It is fortunate "X. X." does not regard the mention of chastity as obscene, for really it is the pearl of great price in these days of lustful men and sad-hearted women. Then those other terrible charges piled high and higher, as "anarchism, socialism, unrestrained lust," etc., and "an utter disregard for all law, divine or human." Why not make known this rank publication, that we may denounce, as all upright citizens should, so vile a sheet, doing violence to all decency and honor? For it is time to guard against the intrusion of these enemies of our peace and happiness.

Among the papers devoted to a radical improvement in public sentiment and laboring in self-sacrifice to lead humanity up to the contemplation of simple truth, there are several worthy of a more cordial reception than they receive from a thoughtless and prejudiced public. Such are the "Twentieth Century," edited by Hugh O. Pentecost; "Christian Life," by Rev. J. B. Caldwell, and last, but not least, but best, in its peculiar work, of all, is Lucifer, the Light Bearer, devoted to the emancipation of women from the tyranny of lustful men, and advocating with bold fearlessness the "right of children to be better born." What thinking mind or feeling heart but must approve of these objects? And yet the very mention of the sex slavery endured by many wives, is by their selfish, lustful husbands, regarded as "obscene." The crime of legal rape is not obscene, but to call public attention to its horrors is "vile and indecent." All honor to the noble man, Moses Harman, its editor, who has endured contumely, fines and imprisonment for the emancipation of womanhood, and thereby the elevation of manhood, who at the age of seventy declares his determination to keep on with the fight, and purify, so far as his labor can, the fireside and the home. Two dozen of the foremost thinkers, ministers, speakers and writers of the present day have published in Lucifer their "protest and pledge" against the aggression of private or class laws abridging the freedom of the press as guaranteed by the Constitution. They are names of men and women who stand not only for progress and liberty, but for purity in the home, society and government. The aims and demands of Lucifer the Light Bearer are indorsed by many of the foremost writers now molding public sentiment. As reading space in a country weekly is precious, I will but indicate one of those demands as the cultivation of "a conscience that will compel girls and boys, as well as women and men to, to have within, such high and holy thoughts o- sex that outward expressions of sexual impurity, in word or deed, will no longer be a possibility." Surely, it cannot be against such a paper we are warned!

Hygienic Rules of Living.

In last week's Light-Bearer reference was made to certain hygienic rules, the neglect of which had caused the scribe of Lucifer to be laid up for repairs. Thinking that some of our readers might care to know what rules in particular were referred to the following paragraphs of that admirable book on "How to Get Well and How to Keep So," are here inserted, in the confident belief that if these plain and simple suggestions were lived up to, more than half the fits of sickness, and of premature break-downs, in health and life, would be avoided.

"You should make it an unupsettable rule to rest—thoroughly and placidly—before and after each meal, so as to store and and have nerve-force (unsquandered on other things) for the good work of digestion; to rest as the worthy man said he did in church, just laid his legs up and thought o' nothin'. Try for only half an hour's nap after the midday meal, there is virtue in it. Be sure and get clear away for at least a month every year. Leave worries and business thoughts behind, and live, careless and free as a happy boy in the happy present.

"Avoid all doings that exhaust and tire; and here I venture to submit that for the sick excitement is not recreation, nor for the o'er-wearied brain-worker are mountaineering and violent bodily exercise repair. Rest, man, rest; there is no return of vital force once expended or squandered. It is gone with the years beyond the flood; and rough is the sackcloth and red the ashes in which we dree our weird of unavailing regret.

"If during business hours you become conscious of growing weary, rest awhile, and then go on again. By using a little tact and judgment you can catch rest now and then, here and there, and manage to escape fatigue while still accomplishing your necessary labors. Drive your pair Work and Worry if so you must, but keep them well in hand and be master. And remember you can bring on diarrhœa and other evils simply by overwork and even quicker by worry. The functional weakness thus induced will arrest digestion, and the foods will decay and ferment just as if you had eaten what is in itself indigestible."

Letter from the Author of "Hilda's Home."

DEAR MR. HARMAN: I suppose you think I take little interest in "Hilda's Home" or I would surely write something about it sometime. Well, I have offered my excuse, "no time," so often that I am ashamed of it, nevertheless it is the only one I have to offer. As I have seen for some time in Lucifer that the book is safely under way, I confidently hope you can have it ready in time for the holidays. Aside from my anxiety to get my own supply by that time—as I want to use some of them for gifts, I am sure there are many more like myself, and I firmly believe you will be able to sell many extra copies if you succeed in getting it ready by that date, so that our friends can buy them for Christmas presents. If they cannot then have them the chances are they will become neglectful and not buy it at all.

Oh, if only some one could and would come forward who had something more to offer than good wishes. As it is, you doubtless receive more empty words than dollars.

Am glad Lillian had an enjoyable time while on her trip to England, but am more than sorry for the occurrence of the Bedborough prosecution. It is sad to think that always our best workers have so much persecution to contend with. I sincerely hope he may come out on top of the pile. Enclosed you will find one dollar. Wish it were ten, or better still, fifty. Use it where you need it most. Give my love to Lillian and kiss little Virna for me. Hoping that the responses to your last appeal will come in to the extent of enabling you to push the work on our book to completion,

I am as ever fraternally, ROSA GRAUL.

Pittsburg, Pa.

[The above brief letter was evidently not written for publication, but believing our readers would be glad to see an occasional word from the author of "Hilda's Home," we give it insertion. If all who have expressed a desire to see this story put in book form had done but half as much to meet the necessary expense as has the author—though herself poor in this world's goods and dependent on hard labor for her daily bread—the book would have been delivered to subscribers many months ago].

VARIOUS VOICES.

Walter Breen, Omaha, Neb.—I quite agree with Henry E. Allen when he declares that Lucifer is practically the best edited paper that now exists. If all papers were thought-provoking and thought-producing, quality and not quantity would be the editor's maxim, and instead of spending time devouring our sixteen and forty-eight page daily journals, people would try to digest instead a few thoughts dropped by those who really think.

O. H. Perry, Great Falls, Mont.—I enclose several names of people who I think will be interested in Lucifer. The stamps are to go as far as they will toward the expense. I would prefer that a copy of the last number (732) be mailed in preference to others, but if not convenient or advisable on account of surplusage of former numbers, then send any copies you deem best. I just exactly know what it is to run a reform paper. Here's sympathy and best wishes and a promise of all available help.

Alfred Gibson, Russellville, Ore'—I see that I am again in arrears for my subscription. I beg you to excuse me for being so slow in paying up—money is coming in so slowly. But I can assure you that I am not at all slow in reading the little vehicle of enlightenment and progress which comes to me very regularly every week. I fell in love with the first copy that came into my hands, and I could not give it up now. Starvation may be staring me in the face, but the paper I must have. May you and your daughter long remain among us and carry on the holy work you have espoused.

A. J. Pope, Lents, Ore.—As H. Addis and I have gone out on a fifteen-acre tract of land eight miles southeast of Portland, and about one mile from Lents, to try to earn a living raising and marketing garden truck, chickens, etc., and rest from our literary and publishing occupation, I thought best to inform you of the change. I am getting calls occasionally for my photograph and some very comforting and encouraging letters. As our nearest neighbor, who moved us out here, is needing help, I am over at his house, his wife and children having moved into Portland to give the children an education, and am chief cook, etc., for three men besides self. I feel much more comfortable and contented now I am usefully employed. With love to all and the same ardent desires for Lucifer's success, I am your Pantarchian friend.

Sara C. Campbell, Roodhouse, Ill.—With R. B. Kerr, I believe more women are ready for sex reform than men. With married couples the woman soon knows that something is wrong, and if intelligent, goes to work with the determination to find the right, and succeeds. She finds that universal freedom is the only road to happiness or heaven on earth. Then if the man has not searched with her, he must be convinced and all will be well. Still woman cannot conscientiously recommend marriage. But with free married lovers, or free lovers who are not married, I see nothing impossible, improbable, unwomanly or anything else that is wrong in woman making the first advance, and I hold that man has the same right, or else we do not have universal freedom. The new man will come with the new woman. They must and will climb the hill difficulty together.

E. E. Lange, Harrisburg, Pa.—Your red cross-ed article in No. 730 read, and in reply will say, that I haven't been able to do as I wished to do. Nevertheless, these seeming hopeless conditions can't drive me to despair. Having a large family for which I consider myself responsible, I'll battle like a man, and am willing to bear weary drudgeries and bitter disappointments for the sake of a better and more human future generation. I have denied myself almost everything. I have been in the movement for social reconstruction for about twenty-five years (i. e. here and in Germany) altogether; and during that period I have spent considerable for the progress of humanity. I am sorry I cannot now spend as freely as I have been doing until recently, when I lost all my real estate property through the agency of our "best (most infernal) banking system in the world"! I like to read your paper, in particular Lillian Harman's articles, but as I don't have means, or at least the assurance to get them, I guess I will have to do without them, much as I regret it. Enclosed you will find fifty cents, part to be applied to earned subscription, for the balance please send "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs." If you have got any numbers of Lucifer or any pamphlets for distribution at any time, send them on, I will gladly distribute them free of charge and where they will do the most good.

C. E. Nichols, Boston, Mass.—Yours just reached me. Let me thank you for it, and hope your father may soon be well. Please send me fourteen copies of "The Creed of Liberty." Also please order fifty copies sent to enclosed address as soon as convenient. In my opinion the little pamphlet is as great an eye-opener as any printed in a like number of words. Its writer, William Gilmour, is Scotland's prose edition of Robert Burns, and today is the clearest, best writer in the "land o' cakes."

[I had the pleasure of spending a few days in the home of William Gilmour, in Glasgow, last summer. I told him that "Bobby Burns" was a great favorite of my father's, and he entertained me by reading selections from the poet, with the native Scotch accent. To William Gilmour is due the credit for a great deal of the life and spirit of the radical movement in Glasgow. He is a clear thinker, forcible speaker and energetic worker. He expects to visit the United States during the coming winter, and would like engagements to speak in cities between New York and the state of Washington. He will probably be accompanied by Maggie Gilmour, who, though not so prominent in public work, is no less earnest in her devotion to the cause of Liberty. I shall never forget my brief visit with these genial Scottish pioneers, and I hope to be one to welcome them to America.

Mr. Gilmour's address is 73 Cedar St., Glasgow, Scotland. Those desiring lectures by him should communicate with him at as early date as possible. L. H.]

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," R. G. Ingersoll, p. 5.

The Wolf at the Door.

There's a haunting horror near us
That nothing drives away;
Fierce lamping eyes at nightfall,
A crouching shade by day;
There's a whining at the threshold,
There's a scratching at the floor.
To work! To work! In Heaven's name!
The wolf is at the door!

The day was long, the night was short,
The bed was hard and cold;
Still weary are the little ones,
Still weary are the old.
We are weary in our cradles
From our mother's toil untold;
We are born to hoarded weariness
As some to hoarded gold.

We will not rise! We will not work!
Nothing the day can give
Is half so sweet as an hour of sleep;
Better to sleep than live!
What power can stir these heavy limbs?
What hope these dull hearts swell?
What fear more cold, what pain more sharp
Than the life we know so well?

To die like a man by lead or steel
Is nothing that we should fear;
No human death would be worse to feel
Than the life that holds us here.
But this is a fear no heart can face—
A fate no man can dare—
To be run to earth and die by the teeth
Of the gnawing monster there!

The slow, relentless, padding step
That never goes astray—
The rustle in the underbrush—
The shadow in the way—
The straining flight—the long pursuit—
The steady gain behind—
Death wearied man and tireless brute,
And the struggle wild and blind!

There's a hot breath at the keyhole
And a tearing as of teeth!
Will do I know the bloodshot eyes
And the dripping jaws beneath!
There's a whining at the threshold—
There's a scratching at the floor—
To work! To work! In Heaven's name!
The wolf is at the door!

The Duration of Feminine Charms.

BY H. B. KERR.

It is generally believed that women become old sooner than men. At thirty a man is considered quite young, but a woman of that age is regarded as almost middle-aged. The fact that it is considered proper for the husband to be older than the wife is evidence of the general belief in the early fading of feminine charms.

Nevertheless, I am inclined to regard the whole thing as a myth. It is notorious that women are considerably longer lived than men. If a woman of any given age wishes to buy an annuity of $100 for life, she will have to pay much more for it than a man of the same age, because her expectation of life is known to be much greater. Now, it would surely be very curious if the sex which lived longest were the one that aged soonest.

When we go into particulars, the popular theory begins to get still more shaky. I do not think that any one maintains that a woman's hair gets gray sooner than a man's, or that a woman's teeth decay earlier. When carefully scrutinized, I think that the popular belief comes down to this, that a woman's complexion fades sooner than a man's.

That, however, seems to me a delusion arising from want of observation. In reality, a man's complexion fades much sooner than a woman's. Indeed, it fades so early that a man is not expected to have any complexion at all. Little boys of ten have just as beautiful complexions as girls of the same age. But a young man of twenty-one with as fine a complexion as a girl of the same age is considered a trifle ridiculous. Men fade so early that a man who reaches twenty-five or thirty and still retains his bloom, is very abnormal. Not only do women expect nothing better than faded men for husbands, but a woman with a sweetheart who is not faded is apt to be a good deal chaffed by her friends.

Thus it comes about that the women have to suffer for the early fading of men. While men fade so early that no one expects them to have beautiful complexions, women retain their beauty until long after maturity. Consequently, when women do fade, the fading is generally noticed, and spiteful tongues are not slow to record the fact.

That the popular belief is a delusion, is well proved by the way in which older women are coming out at the present time. All sorts of women are now to be seen riding bicycles, and dancing at an age at which their mothers would have considered life nearly over. A generation ago readers of Mrs. Yonge's novels were startled and almost scandalized to learn that "Ethel mounted the tower, maugre her thirty years." Last year, however, I heard of an English lady who was learning to ride the bicycle at eighty-five.

This revolution is remarkable everywhere, but is most visible in countries like England, where the age of marriage is constantly becoming later, and where consequently old maidenhood commences later. It is now quite the thing to call an English woman of thirty-five a girl, and to make guesses as to whom she is likely to marry.

The present marriage system has done women a great injury in this matter, as in many others. A woman is expected to be either loved exclusively and for life or not at all. Consequently, it is always necessary for a young man to consider, not only what his lady love is like now, but what she will be like in fifty years. Judged by this standard, a woman of thirty-five no matter how attractive, is at a great disadvantage compared with one of twenty.

It is quite possible that the events of middle life may cause a sudden ageing in women, to which there is nothing to correspond in the life of a man. But I feel sure that, from twenty-five to forty-five, and from fifty onwards, a woman is as young in every way as a man of the same age.

The New Ideal in Education

BY ALBERT CHAVANNES.

This is an age of new ideals, due probably to the freedom of thought following the scientific overthrow of the belief in creation. We have new ideals in religion, new ideals in economics, new ideals as to sexual relations, and we must also have new ideals in education, for the teaching of evolution is, that progress consists in a correlative development where any advance can only be of permanent use if complemented by many others

What is this new ideal education, and how does it bear upon the position occupied by "An Old Fogy" and answered by Lillian Harman?

Let me say here that I use the term "education" to designate that full training of all the faculties which prepares us for the battle of life, and not in the restricted sense in which it is commonly used.

A somewhat thorough study of the law of conduct has shown me that social progress depends upon three different factors. An increase of independence of character, a greater degree of self-control and a better system of organization. I have never been able to find any real and lasting social progress which was not based upon an advance in these three lines of individual development, and the teachings of the past are that any progress which is based upon only one or two of these lines will be transient and end in failure.

The improvement in the education of children depends upon the improvement of the family, and to be real, the parents must have progressed in these three directions beyond the average of the society by which they are surrounded. If they have not, they may be theoretically acquainted with the best systems of education, and make all kinds of good resolutions, but the end will be a failure so far as any special advance is concerned. The average education of children is based upon the average amount of independence of character, self-control and power of organization possessed by the average individuals who compose society.

This being understood, let me say that there are some families which have progressed beyond the average, and possess a little more of these three qualities. There are families where parents are really independent, not only in name but in fact. Where the mother controls that part of the partnership—usually housekeeping—which falls to her share as completely and absolutely as it is possible to do in associated life. Where, although she is anxious to please her household, and does not find in independence an excuse to neglect her work, yet her word is law within her realm, and her decisions are accepted as final. The same is, of course, true of the father so far as regards his sphere of influence, but he has so long enjoyed this privilege that it occasions no remark. This perfect independence requires a great deal of self-control, and a fair power of organization, and as these qualities are sometimes partly lacking, they can be supplemented between persons of different sexes, by the sympathy which naturally exists between them.

When a couple has reached that stage, there is a fair prospect of an advance toward a better system of education. The father and mother who mutually respect their own independence, will easily respect the independence of their children; depending on self-control to regulate their conduct, they will teach their children to regulate their conduct by the same power; and the power of organization which teaches them how to divide their work and to faithfully attend to the part of the work which falls to their share, and to trust the other for a like faithful fulfilment, will teach them to set apart light tasks for their children, and to place upon them the full responsibility or their fulfilment.

Right conduct is not the result of rules and precepts. To teach a child to say "please" and "thank you" will not make him polite or thankful. The child who sees his parents considerate of each other's feelings, and who knows that they are considerate of his own, will soon learn to be considerate of the feelings of others. If the parents are industrious, orderly, economical, very little teaching will be needed to develop the same qualities in their children, and they will not need to resort to threats and punishments.

It may be accepted as a fact, that in the matter of training, it depends always upon the qualities possessed by the parents and that if the education is defective it is not due to disposition of children, but to the defects of the parents, and while these defects seem to branch out in many directions, I have always found their root to be lack of independence, self-control and the power of organization.

As regards the article written by "An Old Fogy," it would be easy for me to show how the parents of whom he speaks, had each and every one broken the most plain laws of conduct, but I will only say a few words about that old saying, "As the twig is bent." The only truth of that saying is that faculties grow by use, and good and bad qualities are strengthened by the environments, but if any one supposes that the future of a child depends altogether on the education he receives, or the conditions by which he is surrounded, he is making a great mistake. The most important factor is the inheritance he receives from usually one or the other of his parents. No one who has used his power of observation for any length of time, but what has seen families where the children, differing from their very birth in disposition, have received the same training, and some have turned out a success and the others failures The strict training—meaning the harsh discipline advocated by "An Old Fogy," and justified by the saying, "As the twig is bent," etc., usually ends in failure, for it is a training of restriction and not of development.

So far as economic success is concerned, the most successful training is that given to boys on the farm, not on account of more restraint, but because of more liberty, and also because a farmer's life develops more independence, self-control, and the power of organization. The farmer's boy is compelled by the conditions of his life to learn to rely upon himself, to decide for himself, and to accomplish tasks which demand the exercise of these three qualities. The same is unhappily not true of girls raised on the farm, who are kept under the mother's wing, and seldom accomplish as much as girls raised in the city.

Lucifer is devoted to the growth of independence in a most useful direction, but let us not forget that independence alone is not a sufficient basis of progress, and that other qualities must be developed before we can make any beneficent change in our social institutions.

"Stop Feeling and Go to Thinking."

MY DEAR HELEN: The intellectual crumbs that fell from these rich men's tables come from "The Ladies Home Journal" loaf, and it requires some effort to be perfectly grateful, but here is something:

"A woman is lovely in man's eyes in proportion as she is womanly in her tastes and careful of his earnings."

Blessed be our enemies; for they tell us much truth.

I have not seen Charlotte Perkins Stetson's "Women and Economics," either; but, if we sit still everything may come around to us yet—according to the proverb. I have always heard it spoken very well of, but neither the extracts nor the reviews that I read gave me a definite idea of it. I did not find myself in touch with the idea that seemed to be much dwelt upon, viz., that "women are over-sexed." I do not think it true. Largely I doubt it because, since sex is the voice and soul of life, I conceive it impossible to be over-sexed. It would be as apt if one were to speak of women as being over-educated or over-refined. A musician cannot have an ear too well attuned to melody or harmony, but he may become by the very fullness of his culture, unfitted for daily life in the noise of the streets. The "over-training" of an athlete which makes him too fine for his work is simply wrong training. There is no ultra-excellence. Most of the world, men and women, are, as yet, under-sexed—even for life as it is.

But—unless I am all wrong as to Charlotte Perkins Stetson's meaning—she feels, probably, that women are under-developed otherwise; and I agree with her entirely. Women's sex impulse can be quite safely left to take care of itself. It has had its own education through all the ages. The man who meets the fine woman on her own plane will find fullness of beauty and power in the instinct which responds to him. What women need, I think, is not a denial or negation of their love nature in any of its various manifestations, but a wiser control of the forces within them, that the true wealth of their nature may flow outward into more fullness of light and life, instead of inward, in self-devouring floods of feeling. I once heard a mother reprove her boy for crying. He said, "I can't stop crying, I feel so bad."

Her answer was: "Don't you know you must stop feeling and go to thinking?"

Women need the same prescription. If they will think more deeply they will feel to more purpose. Whether their sensibilities are too acute or not, they are certainly acute about the wrong thing. They are in danger of celebrating their own emotions as divine, and it is this uncontrolled and undirected emotion which has been eulogized as if it were real greatness of character. One secret of a deep success—there are many perhaps—is to find in life that to which we belong and cling to it against advice, or misconception or censure—to believe in ourselves, against the standards of all men and women who have ever lived. It may be that to do this we shall have to "stop feeling and go to thinking" a great many times. Certain it is that we shall have to search the secrets of the universe and the secrets of our own hearts more thoroughly and deeply than we have been doing. "We must meet and touch all life before we can see and sing ourselves." We can never again be content with loving a few people madly, or blindly, or unhappily. Then we shall love truly and that is always happiness.

And then, too, there is no doubt that women would get far more of the satisfying out of the years of their life if they would once attempt, studiously attempt, to taste "the impersonal delights of life as a perpetual discovery." If it is possible, as George Elliot believed, "for this sort of impersonal life to attain a great intensity—possible for us to gain much more independence than is usually believed of the small bundle of facts that make our own personality," then will there be wondrous wealth of enduring joy as a reward for all resolute efforts at expansion and deliverance.

There is much wisdom in "Love's Coming-of-Age." It is in one of Carpenter's other books that he says, alluding to the world's lack of progress in certain directions, something like this:

"We have increased our store of technical knowledge and we have forgotten the beginning of wisdom."

Carpenter has not forgotten the beginning of wisdom. His treatment of what might perhaps be called the one sidedness of women is more acceptable to me than any designation of them as over-sexed. I believe he says something like this:

"The perpetual accentuation of sex—as if they were all sex"

That seems to me to touch the truth more surely. Women have been treated as if they were all sex. But he takes a tone more in accord with my own feelings and belief when he speaks of men as being undeveloped in their love natures rather than of woman as being over-developed and excessive. I should not wonder if woman's affections were, as yet, the strongest and best gift she has. I don't want them to be less. But I want her to be more besides. Men's greatness is, as yet, in other things, as Carpenter points out. When love lays hold upon him it is apt to take a violent form and to seem like a whirlwind of power, for the very reason that it is a force from without, foreign to him, not as yet an abiding, essential strength of sweet life within. Small wonder that it flashes and flares and as quickly dies, like "the fire of olive wood." But as the cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty, so the cure for the evils of love is more love.

But this time again I have written all around my intention. I meant to talk about magnetism, but not technically. I am afraid the word is becoming fatally "polarized." And I meant to lament that Carpenter, in the letter, sometimes seems to come dangerously near St. Paul and George Eliot in the spirit.

GIOTTO.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXVI.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

LABOR, SKILL AND CAPITAL. Organic life consists mainly of three elements, CHO, carbon, hydrogen and oxygen, combined in different proportions and different ways. So the organic life of co-operation has three elements, labor, skill and capital, which must be harmonized in order to ensure success. Labor and skill must be combined in different proportions in manual labor, and in mental labor, and capital is required to enable either skill or labor to be effective. Neither of the three can be dispensed with; all contribute to production; but the ratio of the contribution varies with the kind of production and the mode of production. The plan of organization must be such as to enable the three to co-operate, and such as to distribute the production equitably; and must be so elastic and so adjusted that in its operation the tendency shall be to continually approach greater efficiency and justice.

A Young Girl's Missionary Work.

BY C.

I have noticed that among my young friends, more especially the boys, the terms "cat" and "tommy" are often used when speaking of prostitutes. I severely reprimanded one of them and asked him why he spoke of them in this way. He said that he had not spoken of them in that manner intentionally, for he pitied them and respected them as much as he did any girl. I looked at him in surprise and asked him what had given him the idea.

He said, "Heretofore I have looked down on them, and even laughed at them, but after I read the Lucifer which you gave me I began to consider the question, and then I came to the conclusion that I was a prostitute of the same degree, if not worse, for I had fallen to that station in life from choice, while they had fallen from necessity. And now I treat them with as much consideration as my own sister."

I had quite forgotten that I had given him the paper, and was surprised to see such fruit of my efforts.

Lectures and Entertainments.

M. Florence Johnson is coming west during the present month, and desires engagements between New York and Kansas. She delivers radical and secular lectures, and is a first-class public entertainer. She is a graduate of the Emerson College of Oratory, of Boston. A plan of campaign which has been proved successful in many places is to arrange and advertise a popular entertainment on the first evening, with the Free-thought lectures following on succeeding evenings. Mrs. Johnson's clear mind and charming personality always win many friends for the cause, as well as for herself, wherever she goes. For terms, dates, etc., address M. Florence Johnson, 244 W. 143 St., New York, until November 11. After that date address her at 1394 W. Congress St., Chicago.

LILLIAN HARMAN will read a paper before the Ohio Liberal Society at Cincinnati, on Sunday evening, Nov. 13. Owing to pressure of work in office, and illness of the editor, her stay in Cincinnati will be as brief as possible, but she hopes to see many of Lucifer's friends at the place of meeting, G. A. R. Hall, 35 W. 6th. St.

without the co-operation of someone else. And let woman be able to do all this alone, yet her very love of ease and repugnance of doing battle with the outer world, will prompt her to place herself in the power of some man who is willing to assist her in this in return for favors she may be able to grant.

All this, of course, does not argue that our institutions are perfect and that marriage laws are what they might and should be. But to me woman seems to make a mistake in trying to deprive herself of the advantages she has gained by her centuries of cunning and diplomacy.

ADOLPH G. VOGELER.

The article referred to occupies, with its accompanying illustrations, nearly a half page of the Sunday "Tribune," and is headed in large display type, "Here's the Most Remarkable of All Mothers. Married at Fourteen, She has had Two Pairs of Twins and Twenty Other Children, Nineteen Living in Good Health. Her Children Have All Been a Comfort to Her; She is Fair Forty and Happy and Does Not Like New Women."

One of the first queries that suggests itself to one who knows anything of the ways of the "reporter" when in search of a sensational "take" or "scoop," to make his paper sell, is, How much of this interview with Mrs. Swartwood, of Mountain Top, Pa., is "straight goods?" and for how much of it did the enterprising hunter for news draw upon his own fertile fancy? Admitting, however, for the argument, that the report is substantially correct, let us inquire whether the facts as stated, bear out Friend Vogeler's inferences therefrom.

First, "A normal phenomenon." Yes, normal, because in accord with the well-known rule or principle of nature known as "the greater fecundity of lower organisms." All the lower or primary organisms, whether of plant or animal, are more prolific than are the higher or more complex, and therefore more valuable. The mother fox in the fable taunts the mother lion on her own productiveness, as compared with the latter's "one at a time." "Yes," retorted the lioness, "I have but one, but he's a lion!"

That "child bearing is not a curse, but a source of gratification" under normal conditions, to a woman, whether "simple" or the reverse, is not to be disputed, nor that it is passively submitted to, and even welcomed when it comes once every year, by the woman who is simply "a creature of impulse," with little or no aspiration or conception of anything higher and better than to be simply a breeder—a "multiplier and replenisher of the earth," a seeker of notoriety as the most prolific of mothers. I have known a few such. One in Kansas—the mother of fourteen children, one for each year, or thereabouts, of married life—who was reported as boasting that she was good for a dozen more. Her home was the abode of squalor and wretchedness. Her children were below ordinary in intelligence, quarrelsome, disobedient, indolent, shiftless, promising candidates for lives of vagabondage, or of vice and crime. They could not go to school because of lack of clothes and books, and had no desire to go when offered help from outsiders.

In the case of the Swartwood family the mother says: "We've given them all as good a schooling as they can get around here, and school's a good place for them because it gets them out of the way, teaches them something and keeps them out of mischief." This means that the education of her children must be wholly entrusted to others, and that it is a relief to get them out of the way so that the mother can spend all of her time in work to supply the animal wants of her numerous household. This view is borne out by what Mrs. Swartwood says elsewhere: "It keeps me and the girls pretty busy working looking after the eating and washing of our large family but we get along all right. Father makes seventy dollars a month and the boys about ninety, and, while we are getting along we've nothing to spare."

What a revelation is here! With an income of $160 a month it gives the mother and larger girls all they can do to look after the "eating and washing" of the household. From this income there is nothing to spare for culture. The father is "an engineer on a railroad" and he and his larger boys presumably have steady employment. What would it be if the father were a brakeman, a common day laborer, or a coal miner, a a dollar a day or less, and subject to be "laid off" half the time, and no other source of income for these dozen and a half or two dozen mouths to be fed and backs to be clothed?

Looking for causes, it is easy to see why such prominence is given in a leading political journal to an object lesson like this, a lesson glorifying traditional marriage, with its necessary accompaniment, its logical sequence—obedient, contented and prolific motherhood. The state, the nation, that is, the ruling class, wants nothing so much as an unfailing supply of subjects such as the conditions herein described naturally produce—men whose time is fully occupied in looking after their own animal needs and those of their families, men with just enough intelligence to go to the polls and "vote 'er straight," at the command of the party boss; men who are satisfied with the old; men who are born worshippers of authority (church and state); worshippers of creeds and constitutions, and who have a horror of everything new, especially the "new woman," knowing full well that the new woman with her demand for self-ownership, her "fewer children and better," would bring, in time, the intelligent man, the self-respecting, the self-reliant citizen, the citizen who could and would be his own ruler, his own lord and master, and that with the advent of the new man the old system of rulers and subjects, of masters and slaves, would speedily pass away.

Yes, Friend Vogeler is right when he calls "woman a creature of impulse, as opposed to man the reasoner." This has been true, of woman, the typical woman, in all the Past,—the Old Woman,—and that the old woman is still getting in her work, supplying the power-loving bosses with their needed contingent of obedient tools, unending swarms of man-worshippers, authority-worshipers, flag-worshipers, "patriotism"-shriekers —"patriotism, that last resort of knaves,"—as some one has aptly said— we have only to observe such popular demonstrations as that of the Peace Jubilee referred to by our correspondent. On that day, as reported by the daily papers, many thousands of people of both sexes, stood on the streets and side walks exposed to the inclement weather, from daylight till noon, waiting, patiently waiting, to get a sight of the military pageant headed by William McKinley, of the town of Canton, State of Ohio, at present occupying the position of chief ruler of the United States of America. Forgetting or neglecting their business, their health—the papers stated a few days afterward that "one-third of the people of Chicago were suffering with colds as one of the results of the Jubilee demonstration"—forgetting the miseries of the homeless and starving poor everywhere around them, forgetting that the alleged peace is a hollow mockery, and that war between the races and the classes in every state of the so-called American nation has become a chronic condition, these thousands, these hundreds of thousands of people waved their hats and their kerchiefs and flags and shouted themselves hoarse in honor of the hero of the hour—the figure-head representing "authority," "government," power and authority to rule and to rob by wholesale the inhabitants of the earth.

Tomorrow, November 8, these same masses of people will go to the polls—or that part of the people enfranchised by our class laws, will go to cast a vote,—for what? For the equal right of all to nature's opportunities? For free access to land, to coal and other useful minerals? For the right of the laborer to all that his labor produces? For equal rights for all to the use of the common mails for the transmission of honest thought? For public ownership and control of the public utilities? For equal right of the worker to a share in the advantages of labor-saving inventions? for lower salaries for public officers and better pay and fewer hours of work for those who do the hardest and most disagreeable work? For lower taxes, and against further expansion of bonded indebtedness?

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

IN ANSWER to many kind inquiries the editor gladly reports himself slowly convalescent, though still very weak. Personal letters will receive attention as soon as possible.

"HILDA'S HOME" will be ready for delivery, no serious accident intervening, about the middle of next month, December. Meantime, we hope to receive many more orders for copies to be sent by friends as holiday presents.

DON'T FORGET that our next issue will contain report of the Memorial Meeting of Nov. 11. A verbatim report of C. L. James' speech will be given, and as good a translation of Dr. Schultz' speech as we can obtain. Mr. James' speech, alone, will be worth more than the price charged for the paper. Please send in orders as early as possible, that we may know how many papers to print. We offer them at the reduced price of one cent a copy in lots of twenty-five, or one hundred for ninety cents.

C. C. MOORE, editor of the Blue Grass Blade," Lexington, Ky., has been arrested for "advocating free love in its most flagrant form" in an editorial published in his paper Oct. 3, '97. He is under bonds of $1,000 to appear for trial next February. No one but a detective of the "Vice Society" could discover advocacy of free love in Mr. Moore's writings. He has bitterly even vindictively, opposed it and its advocates through the columns of his paper. Nevertheless he should have right of free publication. None are compelled to read his paper against their will, and those who want to read it should be permitted to do so.

THE DATA OF ETHICS, by Herbert Spencer, is a book needed in every library. Here is an opportunity to obtain a handsome copy of this masterpiece, practically free. We have obtained a small supply handsomely bound in maroon cloth, with gold lettering and gilt tops, printed in large, clear type on good heavy paper. It contains 350 pages, and is divided into sixteen chapters. Until the present supply is exhausted we will send a copy of this book to anyone who sends us the address of a NEW subscriber, accompanied by one dollar for Lucifer one year, and ten cents for postage on the book. This is an offer which you cannot afford to miss, and which we cannot afford to duplicate after these books are gone.

The English Inquisition.

The cable brings us the news that George Bedborough is convicted and bound over to appear for sentence. It is yet too soon to receive particulars by mail, but it is probable that we shall have letters and newspaper reports to publish in our next issue.

Fortunately, conviction and defeat are not synonymous terms. The English prison system is atrocious, and if our brave young comrade is not crushed in mind and body, no thanks for his preservation will be due the system. I hope and believe that he will have the strength to endure. His is now the hardest part—that of silent endurance. For us who remain outside prison walls the work remains to advance and spread the ideas for which George Bedborough suffers the slavery of an English prison.

In conversation with Chief Inspector Melville, in his office in Scotland Yard, in London last summer, he said to me:

"Well, this will be a good advertisement for you."

I replied that while his words were true, we were not seeking such advertisements and could quite dispense with them.

"Yes, but 'The blood of the martyrs,' you know," he said. "If it hadn't been for that we would have moved in the matter long ago!"

It remains for us, now, to show the prosecutors that their Chief was a true prophet. They must see that the desire for universal freedom is not to be crushed by the imprisonment of any number of leaders.

Woman—Past, Present and Future.

The following very suggestive letter by the editor of the "Western Druggist" was written, as the writer tells us, on the "great day of the Peace Jubilee," while all Chicago, or nearly so, was on the streets, marching or watching the parade:

I write for the purpose of sending you the illustrated article from the Chicago Sunday "Tribune" (October 16), about the Pennsylvania woman, who at the age of forty is the mother of twenty-four children (twenty living), good for half a score more, and who glories in this fact, praises her husband and pities the woman who is otherwise disposed.

I should like to see Lucifer writers comment on this case. Looking at it in an unprejudiced way, are we not dealing here with a normal phenomenon which, however, in our artificial civilization, has become so rare as to attract attention? Child bearing is not a curse, but a source of gratification to this simple woman, and whatever bodily discomforts she must endure are forgotten the moment the thing is over—just what we expect normally in woman, a creature of impulse, as opposed to man, the reasoner. To this woman the man is not the brute it is fashionable now to picture him. She understands his natural promptings, which in herself she does not suppress, and not having disfigured her anatomy by the engines of civilized life, she takes things good-naturedly as they come—even if they come twinwise.

Of course I don't favor families quite as extensive as this one—there is a limit to everything. But as to the new woman and her apostles, suppose we apply her theories conjointly with those of our friends, the anarchists. Remove all governmental restraint and let women as a whole submit to the desires of men only when they wish to become mothers. The nature of man is not altered by these arbitrary conditions; his sexual impulse remains as imperative and all-controlling as ever; he looks about him for a mate, but finds no congenial soul; his impulse becomes terrible, he is strong, women are weak—by brute force he compels to his desires the first woman crossing his path. The woman may struggle, but blows will subdue her—and no government to protect her frail person! After a few such terrible experiences, this man no longer need apply his fists, the woman becomes his ready slave to avoid the punishment. Having made one woman submissive, the man will naturally seek her out in the future; and she? Well, she will try to make the best of a bad bargain by putting the man into a good humor by petting him and indulging his humors and slaving for him.

Have we not then gone right back into the original state of savage man, and will not the entire race thus revert to barbarism? Then in course of time, the whole system of the family will redevelop until it again reaches monogamy, brought about by wily woman who, though weak, learns to govern man and bend him to her will. Woman has made out of man, the heterogamous, a fairly monogamous companion, who looks after her welfare more or less perfectly, according to his development. But the economically free and independent woman who also is sexually absolutely free must remain an iridescent dream so long as man retains his present sexual nature unchanged, and woman is the frail being that nature made her, who cannot exist in a civilized community, make a living and raise children

No, no! For none of these things will the voting masses be allowed to cast a vote. The party bosses are careful to keep all such questions out of politics. The voters will be called on to vote on questions that have only a remote bearing on their personal interests, questions that they have neither the time to study, nor the mental capacity to comprehend, such as the tariff, the single or double standard for money, McKinley's policy of "expansion," etc., etc.—anything to blind the eyes of the voters and divert their attention from things that more nearly concern them.

All this I am saying is old, old and stale to readers of Lucifer, and is only spoken of in this connection to show what the natural, the necessary result is and must continue to be, of the working of the system accepted by Mrs. Swartwood, and endorsed as "normal" by our good friend Vogeler. Yes, woman in all the past has been a "creature of impulse," and the same is largely true of woman in the present, but must it ever be thus? Evolution means change. That which was normal in the past need not always remain normal. Some of us see signs of awakening, of regeneration. The woman of the future will not be simply a creature of impulse, of emotion. She, too, will be the reasoner. She will combine the excellencies now divided between the sexes. She will neither rule nor be ruled, will neither invade nor be invaded, and the man elected by her to be her companion, her co-operator, must be like-minded with herself or there will be no co-operation.

The fears of our friend that the new woman in freedom will not be able to defend herself against the old man is without foundation, since with the new woman must also come the new man who will have "put off the old man with his deeds," as was predicted by one of old time.

Much more I would like to say in reply to our good friend's thoughtful article, but space and strength fail. M. H.

The Queston of Discipline, Again.

BY C. L. JAMES.

"An Old Fogy" deplores the boorishness of Americans, which he attributes to their being generally allowed to grow up without discipline. Certainly, if the evil exists, it is a real one; and if it can be traced to this cause, that is an argument in favor of discipline. First then, is it a fact that Americans, as compared with other nations, are boors? Several people have said so besides "An Old Fogy." But not a few foreigners visiting the Americans, have been much impressed by their politeness. They observe that a woman can travel alone from Maine to California with less danger of being insulted than if she crossed a street in Paris; that every stump-speaker in England expects a salute of dead cats and rotten eggs, while in America, such demonstrations at the polls are very rare; that an Italian at a theatre shows his disapprobation by hissing, while an American keeps still or goes away.

I am inclined to think the reconciliation of these conflicting accounts will be found just this—that there is really much more boorishness in other countries than in America; but the boors there are kept at a distance from the cultivated people by severe "discipline," whose utter failure to improve them appears whenever they enjoy the license of any such Saturnalia as an election, a show, or a journey with an unprotected woman. To insist on obedience from the weak is certainly not polite. It is, I am firmly persuaded, the law of social progress that a disposition to do this varies as the disposition to obey the strong; and both of them inversely as cultivation. Both are stronger among savages than civilized people, and stronger in half-civilized communities than highly civilized. Both, I fear, are more common among women than men, because women have been, to a greater extent than men, either oppressed or pampered, that is, in either case, badly taught. Notwithstanding the obvious interest of the poor, both are more common among the poor than the rich, especially in old countries where the rich are not generally upstarts; and this because the poor, particularly in such countries are, on the whole, the ignorant and uncultivated. Both probably are less common in America than elsewhere, because America is on the whole, the most evolved of nations.

It is the fashion among old fogies to say that people need restraint. To simplify discussion, we may admit that they very often do. A child needs it to keep him out of the water and the fire. A maniac needs it to keep him from killing himself and others. A criminal needs it to prevent his multiplying crimes and being lynched. These, surely, are extreme cases. Now observe: In every one of them, the need for restraint is physical. In every one, the effect of the restraint is morally injurious. That it is so to the child no one can doubt who has seen so familiar a spectacle as a baby in a rage. That it is so to the lunatic is stated by all alienists, and that it is to the felon by all penologists. But since the mind is admitted to be more important ultimately than the body, though it may be in less imperative need of immediate attention, this follows that restraint should be reduced to a minimum. The recent improvements in the treatment of children, lunatics and criminals have all taken the form of dispensing with it as far as practicable. The results have been most happy. The "whining schoolboy with his satchel and shining morning face, creeping like a snail unwillingly to school," belongs to a past era. Under the new system the insane are actually restored and criminals reformed. Under the old, nothing was ordinarily expected but to keep them from doing harm. Furthermore, it is carrying charity beyond reasonable limits to believe that those in authority ever really thought repression beneficial to its subjects. That it saved themselves trouble and gratified their own instincts of dominion or anger, is much more reasonable to suppose. The morally noxious practice never sprang from morally commendable feelings. The pons asinorum of anarchism is that people do not take the trouble to govern for nothing, or for the stinted wages of popular officials, but for the perquisites of office and the lust of power.

Lending a Hand

We gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following sums to sustain the publication of Lucifer—sent in response to the proposition of Henry W. Youmans and of others:

A Friend, 50c; Bryan Bros., 10c; Theresa Hughes, $1.25; Lucy N. Coleman, $1; W. W. Miller, 30c; Alamo, $1; A Friend, St. Louis, Mo., $2.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Lois Waisbrooker, 28 8 St., San Francisco.—Please say to your readers that I found it injured me to try to psychometrize, and thus prevent their sending to me, as I do not like to disappoint them.

W. H. Pilcher, Chandlerville, Ill.—Inclosed find postal order for one dollar, which sets me ahead. I have been a reader of your paper for many years, but I am now very much interested in Mental Science. That "all is good and that there is no evil," is so averse to what we have all been taught, that it is a stumbling block to some and foolishness to others. Yet it is claimed to be the basic truth—involving the startling doctrine of the possibility of overcoming death itself. Mental science is so closely related to the sex question—to "regeneration," to "Heaven on earth," that I think it germane to Lucifer's work, and would be glad to hear what others think of it.

A. J. Motta, Geraldton, Western Australia.—I enclose four shillings for thirteen weeks' subscription to your paper, and four of your books. "In Hell and the Way Out, "How the Devil Beat the Salvation Army, "Human Rights," and "The Sexual Enslavement of Women." These are the books which I should think would promote freethinking (as I have been a freethinker nearly all my life). If not, and you have any books that you would prefer for freethinking, you would do me a great favor by sending them and I will be only too glad to remit the money by return mail, and if you don't send them let me have the names of them and the price, and I will write for them when the others arrive. I also enclose six cents for stamps which you will have to use in your reply.

Elsie Cole Wilcox, Lawrence, Wash.—May I not "for the good of the cause" give in my response to Aunt Elmina's request in the columns of Lucifer? This public method of acknowledging the benefits derived from the liberal correspondence to which she has introduced me, may influence some other isolated woman to take up her pen and send in her name, whereupon Elmina will introduce her to the correspondence circle, from which she may receive, as I have, new life. I was a stranger in a strange land, three thousand miles from my old associates, in the heart of a dense forest, far from any sort of civilization, when I felt inspired to answer Aunt Elmina's ad. Presto! Change! I have not passed a dull hour since I received the first letter! I have grown in knowledge, in breadth of character, in power of expression—in fact, in almost every way. I shudder to think what my life here would have been without the stimulus to intellectual development for which I thank dear Aunt Elmina. Sisters, "Go thou and do likewise."

Kate Austin, Caplinger's Mills, Mo.—I send you fifty cents on my subscription, which is badly delinquent. Will send the balance before the holidays. Have been a subscriber for Lucifer for ten years and have never been in debt like this before. Would have written excuses, but am afraid that excuses do an editor little good. Glad that you are still at the helm and pegging away at superstition, and think if you live to be as old as Methuselah you will still find plenty of work in that line. Lillian's articles are good, and am glad she advocates liberty for the child as well as the adult. I applaud her sentiments when she states her "highest ambition is not to make people law-abiding." It is a pity more mothers are not actuated by the same laudable desire. Yet it is consoling to reflect that some children inherit from dame nature, in so large degree, the "power to think and the desire to rebel," that no discipline can either make or break them. Judging from what I have read, this was true of the immortal Sophie Perovskia, whose father was a tyrant and ruled his family with a rod of iron. Yet his daughter—long live the memory of that fair Russian girl—died on the gallows a rebel and a heretic to discipline, to that law and order element that had converted a portion of that vast empire into a living hell.

"Alamo," St. Louis, Mo.—It have seen last number of Lucifer. Am indeed sorry that the editor is in such a shape. I don't think that the true Altruists, or even the wise and consistent Egoists ought to allow such a journal as Lucifer to perish from among men. I am anything but in accord with the editor religiously, but believing that the paper is doing a work which, rightly understood, will result in the existence of a freer, nobler race, a happier childhood and a truer motherhood, I send as an expression of my sympathy the enclosed dollar—all I can spare—would it were a hundred. Dear friends, "Keep a stiff upper lip!" You are doing a good work and I hope that those who should be Lucifer's friends won't wait till the only thing they can do for it is to put flowers on the graves of the editors who are making such a gallant fight. Ever yours for truth and freedom.

[The writer of the above letter is a minister of Protestant Episcopal church, who while adhering to the old dogmas concerning the "Trinity," the "atonement," etc., is drifting libertyward in other matters, such as woman's right to self-ownership and children's right to be born well. "Alamo" will please accept our thanks for his cheering words of sympathy and hope, and for his substantial aid toward keeping the torch of the Light Bearer burning. M. H.]

L. M. Bryan, New Florence, Mo.—I see by the date on wrapper that I am in arrears, so send sixty cents, fifty cents on renewal and ten cents to help turn on the light in dark places. I realize and have realized for some time that the way of the reformer, as well as the transgressor, is hard; but while the surroundings are discouraging, this particular human form divine persistently refuses to be discouraged, for a man is never whipped until he gives up. He may be robbed of his time or means, but his manhood can never be stolen. So long as he knows what he is it makes very little difference as to what neighbors think he is. Now that our "big meetin'" has progressed far enough to bring the Spaniards to the "mourners' bench" to make peace with America Almighty, and there is no doubt that they will be duly forgiven and their sins removed from them as far as the East is from the West, provided, of course, that there are enough dollars and islands forthcoming to appease the Almighty America's wrath, I propose to sing the "long metre doxology" and be dismissed. The words may sound a little queer, but I think the sentiment is correct when viewed from a "business" standpoint, and that which is not business is decidedly bunglesome, so we will arise and be dismissed.

> Praise Gold from whom all blessings flow,
> Praise him all dampboots here below,
> Praise him above, ye upper crust,
> Praise nuggets, quartz and shining dust.

And now may the love of Gold, the Fodder Almighty, the fellowship of Jarring Crisis, his only begotten son, and the communion of the Hobo Spirit rest and abide with this people forever, amen. Or until they are willing to use their eyes to see, ears to hear, and brains to think.

Isaac Jameson, Brinnon, Wash.—I promised to report progress on our Alaska schooner, but there hasn't been much to report. Owing to the bursting o fthe "golden bubble," together with other minor considerations—insufficiency of funds not being the least—said schooner has so far failed to materialize. At present the boys are away at work, while boat building is temporarily suspended in our yard. I will, as soon as I can take time, write some doggerel for Lucifer on the bursting of the golden bubble and the Klondikers returning.

Last June came one comrade who impressed me very favorably. I hoped he and his boy Harry would cast their lot with us, but I recommended him to visit some of the other colonies in the Sound country, especially Lake Bay and the B. C. C. at Edison. He visited the latter and was so captivated therewith that he came for Harry and returned thither next day. Guess he had too much money to invest it in our little unpopular enterprise. So mote it be.

But we can't all be in one colony, and we want to co-operate with all these colonies that are working to uplift humanity until we absorb the state, the country and the world. We have just had the pleasure of entertaining J. W. Gaskine, late of Los Angeles, Cal., who went to Seattle today, after spending ten days at our home. I have reason to hope that he carried away many pleasant recollections of our picturesque scenery, beautiful views, charming walks and drives, etc. And on the other hand his visit will be long remembered by us.

He was a walking storehouse of information on communistic and co-operative efforts in the United States, having assisted in several attempts and failures. He has written a very interesting history of Icaria; including its obituary, and I believe he has written up some others. He is sixty-two years of age, well read in history, literature, etc., and is sure that communism and co-operation on a large scale, will never succeed. But we'll try again.

"Isabel's INTENTION," by Marsette. This is a story of a sympathetic high-minded English girl of the "upper" classes, who, having been made to believe the popular lie that prostitution is inevitable and that prostitutes are the martyrs who make a virtuous life possible for the rest of womankind, determines to offer herself as a sacrifice to this Moloch. A neat little paper-covered pamphlet of thirty-two pages. Price, 5 cents. Three for 13 cents.

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," R. G. Ingersoll, p. 5.

Price ten cents. For sale at this office.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION. A discussion between Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. The opposing principles are herein stated clearly and briefly. Valuable to those who want to possess the arguments of both sides of the question. Price 15 cents. "Life and Health, or How to Live a Century," by the same author. Price, 10 cents. "A Lecture on Religious, Political and Social Freedom." Price, 5 cents. A set, one of each, for 25 cents.

Horrors of Modern Matrimony As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, "the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 286 pages. Price, 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"Loma"—A CITIZEN OF VENUS," by Prof. Wm Windsor. A story of surpassing interest, largely devoted to Sexologic and Sociologic problems. Like Bellamy in his "Looking Backward," the writer of "Loma" believes in the "state," as a factor in social evolution, but individualists will probably forgive this feature for the sake of the radically revolutionary ideas in regard to popular theories—sexologic, theologic, cosmologic, etc. Substantially printed and artistically bound. Price, post-paid, $1.50. Address this office.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 15 cents.

Labor's "Marseillaise" Hymn.

SUNG AT LABOR MARTYRS' MEMORIAL MEETING, CHICAGO, NOV. 11, 1898.

Ye sons of toil, awake to glory,
Hark! hark! what myriads bid you rise!
Your children, wives and grandsires hoary—
Behold their tears and hear their cries;
Behold their tears and hear their cries:
Shall hateful tyrants, mischief breeding,
With hireling hosts, a ruffian band,
Affright and desolate the land,
While peace and liberty lie bleeding?

CHORUS:

To arms, te arms, ye brave!
Th' avenging sword unsheathe;
March on, march on, all hearts resolved,
On liberty or death!

With luxury and pride surrounded,
The vile, insatiate despots dare,
Their thirst of power and gold unbounded,
To mete and vend the light and air,
To mete and vend the light and air;
Like beasts of burden would they load us,
Like god would bid their slaves adore;
But man is man, and who is more?
Then shall they longer lash and goad us?

Oh! Liberty, can man resign thee,
Once having felt thy gen'rous flame?
Can dungeons, bolts, or bars confine thee?
Or whips thy noble spirit tame?
Or whips thy noble spirit tame?
Too long the world has wept, bewailing,
That falsehood's dagger tyrants wield;
But freedom is our sword and shield,
And all their arts are unavailing.

LABOR MARTYRS REMEMBERED.

Memorial Meeting in Chicago on the Eleventh Anniversary of their Judicial Murder.

ADDRESS BY PROFESSOR C. L. JAMES.

Four Thousand Persons Assemble in Twelfth Street Turner Hall. German and English Speeches.

LABOR'S MARTYRS.
ALBERT R. PARSONS, AUGUST SPIES,
ADOLPH FISCHER, GEORGE ENGEL,
LOUIS LINGG.

The eleventh anniversary of the judicial murder of Chicago's five labor martyrs was celebrated without police interference in the city which hounded them to prison and gibbeted four of them—the fifth escaping the gallows by his mysterious death in his cell the day before the execution, a death attributed to suicide, but now generally believed to have been murder, by all who knew the brave and indomitable spirit of young Louis Lingg.

The graves of the martyrs at Waldheim cemetery were decorated with flowers in the afternoon of Friday, November 11, and at night memorial services were held in Twelfth Street Turner Hall, which was crowded. L. S. Oliver, of Maywood, was the English chairman. Great enthusiasm was manifested and the speakers were repeatedly interrupted by appplause. Following was Among the letters read was one from Bolton Hall, of New York, son of the Presbyterian preacher, Dr. John Hall, who died several weeks ago while visiting in Ireland. Bolton Hall is a radical thinker and writer, a single taxer and follower of Tolstoi. Following is his letter:

BOLTON HALL'S LETTER.

"Secretary Martyrs' Memorial Association, Chicago. I desire to express my hearty sympathy with the object of your Association, as indicated by its title.

"I hope that the memorial exercises which you propose may attract widespread attention, as I believe that there are few ways of bringing home to the consciences of the people that state of organized injustice under which we live, like forcing on their unheeding ears the story of the judicial murder of the Anarchists of Chicago.

"I believe that their execution was a national disgrace in which every one shared, and must still share, at least until he has raised his voice in protest against the system which make such outrages recurrent at Latimer as well as Chicago.

I am yours sincerely, BOLTON HALL.

"You are at liberty to make any use of this letter that you desire."

With a short address setting forth the significance of the memorial celebration, chairman Oliver introduced Professor C. L. James of Eau Claire, Wis., who delivered the principal address in English.

PROFESSOR C. L. JAMES' ADDRESS.

"The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance, but the memory of the wicked shall rot." If we apply this saying of an ancient sage to the men who have died for revolutionary innovation, and the men who put them to death, the result will be melancholy indeed for those whom his honor, Judge Gary designates as "friends of social order." The names of Socrates, of Huss, of Bruno, of Algernon Sidney, of Emmett and of John Brown, are held in everlasting remembrance; but though every one knows they were put to death as enemies of "social order," very few can tell who it was that slew any one among them. Judge Jeffries, indeed, we have all heard of, but if Jeffries knows that now, I fear he wishes he were less celebrated. It is my opinion he does know it—a somewhat unpopular opinion here, perhaps, and certainly a most awful one—but which I put in the front of my address that it may excite no comment later. The murderers of these martyrs have gone to the cavernous hell of oblivion, leaving "such vestige of themselves on earth as smoke in air, or foam on water leaves," except here and there one, whom the martyrs' memory has assisted to the ghastlier hell of everlasting infamy.

Surely the uniformity of phenomena points to a uniformity of cause. There must be a common reason why men so unlike each other as Socrates, the special apostle of philosophic scepticism, and Paul, the chief propagandist of an enthusiastic faith, are about equally honored by the very same persons, while their persecutors are forgotten or remembered only to be execrated. My friends, in that reason is the quintessence of Anarchism. Every sincere conviction, for which a man will die, is original, and every originality is an incipient revolution. This is the voice of the creative spirit in man. Its antagonist, "Law and order," is the voice of the mowing, imitating ape. The martyrs are a noble army, an overwhelming host. No nationality, age, sex, creed or party, is excluded from their ranks. To write their names among the stars they have only this in common, that all sacrificed themselves before the shrine of Liberty. It was natural the earliest among them should not have realized this. Dying fearlessly and with light hearts, for Judaism, or Christianity, or philosophy or their own country, they did not know that they were precursors of anarchy. But it was natural also, that, as experience accumulated and the habit of scientific thought became more general, some sagacious persons learned to separate the pure gold in the crown of every confessor from the dross with which it had been mingled—to understand that absolute individual freedom is the normal state of man; that the pretense of a social contract by which he sells his birthright for the pottage of protection is as false historically as the bargain would be bad if he had really made it; that no government represents anything else than the will of an audacious, shrewd minority, imposed by craft and force upon the credulous, timid majority; that none had ever any other object than to protect, not persons and their natural right to what they produce, but those vested, or factitious rights, which can be enjoyed only through injustice—the right of the landlord, the prince, the pettifogger and the chartered monopolist, the slave-owner.

This great step was first taken about the middle of the last century, in England—though I admit her claim to the glory might be disputed by Ireland. The oldest purely Anarchistic book is the "Vindication of Natural Society," by one whom I hardly know whether to call an Englishman or an Irishman—Edmund Burke. In France, Condorcet, through his "Sketch of the Progress of the Human Mind," advanced similar views a few years later. But the great Anarchistic movement of continental Europe did not begin till the time of Proudhon, Marx and Bakounine, about the memorable year 1848.

It is, therefore, a gross misrepresentation to describe Anarchism as a product of Russian despotism and ignorance. She is the radiant child of Anglo-Saxon liberty. Since Burke's time, neither England nor this country has ever been without Anarchists. Anarchism pervades the bitter pages of Junius. It sparkles in all the brilliant works of Thomas Paine. It struggles through the dreary volumes of Jefferson. The sons of William Lloyd Garrison inform us that he was an Anarchist. The eminent lawyer, Charles O'Connor, was an Anarchist, and refused on that account to be a presidential candidate. This continues the line to our time, though I have omitted many names. Similarly, in England, Godwin, Shelley, Byron, Morris, form an unbroken sequence from Junius to the present. And what an illustrious band is this! Orators unrivalled since Cicero; mathematicians and scientists, poets, who may rank, one with Dante, another with Theocritus; great statesmen; great jurists; such were the parents and foster parents of that Anarchism which the lying bourgeois press is never weary describing as a movement of the ignorant!

But our comrades were not put to death formally as advocates of those principles which they shared with Burke, Junius, Godwin, Garrison and Charles O'Connor. It is, or has been alleged in their advocacy of these principles they became technically liable as accessories, for the death of one Mathias Degan, who was shot in a brawl on the night of May 4, 1886. If this be true, their slayers doubtless had grounds for killing them, not by any means enough to save themselves from the fate of those who tried Socrates, but perhaps to avoid the deeper damnation of those who are remembered for similar acts. They thus force the issue on us whether they deserve to be remembered. Otherwise I would certainly take no trouble to deny them the milder judgment of being forgot.

On taking up their technical points, all critics observe that they have so encumbered it with verbiage as to make the issue almost unintelligible. A trial of eight persons, 136 days in duration, with an indictment of sixty-nine counts, on all which the verdict was "guilty," though they palpably contradicted each other, is itself such a burlesque that, in my opinion, we weaken and confuse our case by trying to analyze. It is a forest which cannot be seen for the trees. It is like the great Wisconsin pineries, near Eau Claire, where I live, which extend four hundred miles by one hundred, but of which you can see nothing when you are there save a gloomy line of dark green giants, all the same height like a rank of soldiers. I shall not perplex myself and you by attempting to explore this thicket. I decline the job of finding all the rotten trunks in a swamp whose area is forty thousand miles. They say that an ounce of dynamite at the center of the earth would blow up the great globe itself. I will take just a little of that dynamite which I carry where Anarchists and other philosophers usually have all their possessions—in the brain—and I will put it at the right place and shatter this Rinaldo wilderness at one blast. That is the only way to drive out all the fiends contained in it.

For the means of effecting this clearance I am very much indebted to Judge Gary, whose vindication of his conduct in the "Century Magazine" will be my chief authority. Judge Gary is reputed to be a good lawyer. He has come voluntarily from the bench to the bar, and that not as plaintiff but defendant. His contention is no longer that our comrades committed murder. It is that he did not commit murder. If then, from the ex parte argument of this able advocate himself, we can show plainly that he did commit murder with his eyes open and his judicial oath suspended before them, we shall have proved all that his part of the day's task requires, and need waste no time upon the mountains of irrelevant matter under which this horrid fact has been hidden, or the labyrinths of special pleading in which it has been sheltered.

My reasons for making the serious charge that Joseph E. Gary, sitting as a judge, put men to death unjustly, in order to serve a political purpose are, I have intimated, innumerable. But I shall only give two which concern the points he has himself selected as capital.

The irresistible demonstration of the first count in the indictment for murder against Joseph E. Gary, is as follows: In order to establish the guilt of an accessory before the fact it is necessary to prove that the principal was influenced by what the accessory did. Judge Gary overrides this principle of criminal law, and allows it to be simply guessed that the accessory influenced a principal who, being entirely unknown, may never have had any communication with him whatever. In proof that the principal must be identified, not by name indeed, but as a person whom the accessory assisted, I will not cite authorities today. You may find them on pp. 138 and 234 in the brief of W. P. Black and Salomon and Zeisler before the Supreme Court of Illinois at the March term, 1887. But I prefer Judge Gary's own favorite ground of "common sense." An accessory before the fact is one who assists the principal to commit the crime; and common sense teaches that this can be proved against no man unless an actual physical connection—not merely a possible connection—between his acts and those of the principal be proved. But Judge Gary says, in his "Century" article: "It is inconceivable that the man who threw a bomb made by Lingg, one of the conspirators, was not, by some of these speeches and publications encouraged to do so." And this is his comment on his charge, as cited at p. 234 of the brief.

Short as the comment is, there are two glaring falsehoods here. It is perfectly conceivable that the man who threw even a bomb made by Lingg never heard or read a line spoken or written by Parsons or Spies, and it is false that there is anything worthy to be called evidence of Lingg's having made the only bomb which was thrown. It was Gary's duty as judge in a capital case, to charge the jurors very particularly that the influence of the defendants' acts on the thrower of the bomb must be clearly made out. What he did tell them was that if they thought the thrower of the bomb was proved a member of the same conspiracy with the defendants (meaning the International) and acted as such, they must convict. That is far beyond the accepted law of conspiracy, and he knows it; therefore, in the "Century" article he befogs the issue, after that fashion adopted by himself and his accomplices all through, with statements widely different, but as fallacious as the first.

A familiar, and by no means bad way of exposing a legal error is to show what would come of it if it were logically carried out. Under Judge Gary's rulings every abolitionist in America was accessory to the death of every man killed in the John Brown raid. The abolitionists' organization was just as much a conspiracy as the International. Both were framed in avowed hostility to existing institutions. Neither ever was so absurd as to formally adopt an unlawful purpose. On this point, read carefully Judge Gary's malignant and garbled extract from a so-called "Platform of the International," and note how he is compelled to grudgingly acknowledge that. But both have had a substantial share of illegal acts. One of those acts was the John Brown raid, in which several men were killed. Shortly before that raid Brown was closeted with Whittier, who wrote to Mrs. Child as follows: "I acknowledge I could not blame him but he showed me one of his pikes, and truly, Maria, it did not look like a Christian weapon." What would have been thought of hanging the Quaker poet and Lydia Maria Child, as accomplices of John Brown? The most bloody-minded slave-owner in South Carolina would not have entertained such a proposition. Yet Whittier was more deeply involved in the John Brown raid than Spies or Parsons in the "Haymarket massacre." He knew what Brown was going to do. He saw the very instruments which were to be used. He said they "did not look like Christian weapons," but he could not blame John Brown. There is no evidence that Spies or Parsons knew anything about the designs of the man who threw the bomb; nay, there is evidence that Spies, at least, would not have approved of them.

In the Chicago "Tribune" during the year before the Haymarket tragedy, there appeared the following paragraph:

"Perhaps if one is not a member of the Humane Society, the shortest way is to put arsenic or strychnine on the meat or other supplies furnished to tramps. This produces death in a short time and is a warning to other tramps to avoid the neighborhood."

Go to the city library today and search the files of the Chicago "Tribune" and you will find what we typos call a "square" cut out. That is the place of the paragraph I have just quoted. It is like the black field in the gallery of the Doges' portraits at Venice, where Marino Faliero's picture ought to be. It attracts every eye, to the exclusion of all the rest. Since this paragraph appeared I read in a Chicago paper that a wealthy farmer had been sent to Joliet for the murder of an unknown tramp. Now, according to Judge Gary's law, Mr. Medill ought also to have been sent to Joliet as accessory to the murder of that tramp. There was quite as much to connect him with it as to connect Spies or Parsons with the killing of Mathias Degan. As for me, I do not think Mr. Medill should have been sent to Joliet. But if I thought Judge Gary's rulings were good law, I should unhesitatingly say he ought. I think he ought not because I am sure Judge Gary's rulings are not good law. There is one who said that for every idle word men shall speak they shall give an account. But He claimed to be the final judge of human actions.

To this adjudication those who believe in his pretensions must refer hasty and intemperate utterances in the Chicago "Tribune," or the "Arbeiter Zeitung," or the "Alarm." And why so? Why, because laws are made, ostensibly, at least, for our mutual protection, and because a law which made loose and unfeeling observations murder would be a law for our mutual destruction. Under such a Draconian code, we should all have to hang each other until the last man hanged himself.

Under Judge Gary's law, every Catholic whose life was sworn away by Titus Oates, suffered justly as an accomplice of Guy Fawkes and Balthazar Gerard; every whig whom Jeffries hanged as participator in the Rye House plot and Monmouth's rebellion, every royalist and Girondin sent to the guillotine by Fouquier Tinville, as accessory to the murder of Marat.

The second point under which I hold Judge Gary convicted by his own mouth, of murder, is contained in his "Century" comment on the first. He holds general recommendations of violence to be murder, if some one resorts to violence which they may possibly have stimulated, and, in so doing, commits murder. Every shyster knows that is not law, and therefore I cannot doubt Judge Gary knows it. General recommendations of resistance to law are a substantive offense. It has a name well known to every six-penny attorney. It is called sedition. But in every free country, the magistrates have been wary about proceeding against sedition lest they should impugn that right of agitation without which representative government would be a mockery. Only despots and their creatures have denied that sedition must be frequently connived at. And the idea that murder can be made out of it is absolutely original with Judge Gary. I will not ask you to take my word for this, but surely you will take his own. Judge Gary says, not in his "Century" article, but his decision overruling the motion for a new trial, apropos to this very point, "The case is without precedent. There is no example in the law books of a case of this sort. No such occurrence has ever happened before in the history of the world!"

In Heaven's name what can Judge Gary mean by this? Not surely that no man was ever tried earlier for sedition as part of a revolutionary agitation which resulted in someone's being killed! He knows, of course, that there have been millions of such cases. I will cite but one.

While the fate of our comrades was in suspense there was an affray at Mitchellstown, Ireland, in which seven men were killed

European Representative, George Bedborough, 51 Arundel Square, London, N., England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

WE HAVE DELAYED sending our forms to press, in the hope of getting a translation, or at least a synopsis, of the principal address in German, delivered at the memorial meeting on the night of the 11th inst. Failing in this, the best we can now do is to promise a full translation of this remarkable address in next week's Lucifer. Believing the address of Dr. Morris Schultz to be one of the best delivered on the "Crime of the Century" we ask all readers of Lucifer to send us their orders for extra copies for free distribution. Terms same as for this week's edition—one cent per copy in lots of twenty-five each, or ninety cents per hundred. Please order early so that we may know how many to print.

ORDERS have been received for some fifteen hundred extra copies of this current issue of Lucifer. Thanks, friends, for prompt and liberal responses to the suggestions in last issue in regard to the propriety of a wide circulation of the Memorial number. In anticipation of still further orders we are printing enough extra copies to supply all probable demands. In packages of twenty-five, one cent per copy or ninety cents per hundred.

THE DATA OF ETHICS, by Herbert Spencer, is a book needed in every library. Here is an opportunity to obtain a handsome copy of this masterpiece, practically free. We have obtained a small supply handsomely bound in maroon cloth, with gold lettering and gilt tops, printed in large, clear type on good heavy paper. It contains 350 pages, and is divided into sixteen chapters. Until the present supply is exhausted we will send a copy of this book to anyone who sends us the address of a NEW subscriber, accompanied by one dollar for Lucifer one year, and ten cents for postage on the book. This is an offer which you cannot afford to miss, and which we cannot afford to duplicate after these books are gone.

Who Is the Coward?

"Bedford Hotel, Covent Garden, London, W. C., October 31. DEAR MOSES HARMAN: Mr. Bedborough pleaded guilty to counts 1, 2 and 3 and was liberated on his own recognizance of of £100 to come up for judgment, if called upon—today—exactly five months since his arrest. With kind regards to yourself and Lillian, I am ever yours sincerely, OSWALD DAWSON."

In a letter written to Lillian October 30, George Bedborough informed her that he was about to do a thing he was heartily ashamed of—to plead guilty to three counts of the indictment against him. He said he felt it was an act of cowardice, but he was acting on the advice of his legal counsel. He regretted that he had employed counsel at all, for he was bitterly disappointed in the weak defense they made for him. Many—in fact nearly all—the friends he had counted on to give him sympathetic support had deserted him, leaving him to bear alone the prosecution backed by all the power of government and of the reactionary element of the population of England. Under the circumstances he felt it was useless to continue to fight in which certain defeat would be accompanied by vengeance measured only by the wrath of the ignorant persecution.

The fact that Bedborough was released on his own recognizance under bail of only £100—less than $500—indicates the insincerity of his prosecutors. It has the appearance of a bid for him to forfeit his bail by fleeing from the jurisdiction of th court—a thing which it is safe to say he will never do, because such action would only tend to support the contention of the prosecution that he really was guilty of the crime charged and had fled to escape punishment that he knew he deserved. Apparently no effort is to be made to punish him further for his alleged crime, but the sentence is to be reserved and held as a club over him to restrain him and others in England from openly attacking the evils of society in general and the institution of marriage in particular.

If George Bedborough be called a coward for his action, what shall be said of the court which has compromised with what it denounces as a crime committed with "intent to debauch the morals of Her Majesty's subjects?" And what shall be said of Dr. Havelock Ellis, the author of the book "Psychology of Sex," for the sale of which George Bedborough was arrested and prosecuted? At the preliminary hearing Dr. Ellis volunteered to go on the witness stand in defence of his book to prove that it was a valuable work on psychology. Other scientists and physicians would have corroborated his testimony and the government would have been forced to abandon its prosecution or base it on other grounds. But when the actual trial of Bedborough came on Dr. Ellis was found wanting. He failed to appear to defend his work in the preface of which he had said:

"I regard sex as the central problem of life. And now that the problem of religion has practically been settled, and that the problem of labor has at least been placed on a practical foundation, the question of sex—with the social questions that rest on it—stands before the coming generation as the chief problem for solution. Sex lies at the root of life, and we can never learn to reverence life until we know how to understand sex—So, at least, it seems to me."

Dr. Ellis certainly meant that when he wrote it, and it was for carrying out that idea, for endeavoring to educate the public in the importance and significance of sex, that George Bedborough was prosecuted. Why then, in his hour of trial, was he deserted by Dr. Ellis?

—just the same as at the Haymarket. An Irish patriot editor, O'Brien by name, was convicted of inciting that riot. He got three months' imprisonment for the same act for which seven Anarchists were condemned to death in Chicago about the same time. The contrast between enslaved Ireland and "free America" is certainly most edifying.

What Judge Gary means is, that in no one of the innumerable cases in which an agitator has been tried for sedition after some one had been killed, was there "ever before in the history of the world" an attempt to make the sedition murder as accessory. That unquestionably is true. But why are the facts thus? Because sedition, though some one may be killed in the ensuing tumults, is not murder as accessory; and because neither Scroggs nor Jeffries ever had the gall to say it was. That glory was reserved for Gary. Dante tells us that when he met St. Peter in Paradise, the apostle's indignation at the conduct of his successors turned all the heavens red. Be sure that when Judge Gary's law was reported in another place the shame of Jeffries tinged the flames of hell with the same color. Jeffries never thought of that. It would have saved him lots of trouble if he had, and he particularly disliked trouble. What a labor-saving device it would have been on the Bloody Circuit just to say:

"Confound the law and the facts! The law is common sense. The fellow is a whig and that's enough to hang him"

Awa', whigs, awa'!
Awa', whigs, awa'!
Ye're but a pack o' traitor loons,
Awa', whigs, awa'!

There is but one magistrate—an American they say, though I believe Ireland has also a claim on him—who ever in any measure anticipated Judge Gary; and he was not regularly invested with the judicial ermine. I need not add that the name of this eminent jurist was Lynch.

I have stated that I believe in the immortality of the soul. It seems improbable Judge Gary does. His anxiety to justify himself must be founded, I think, on the fear Macbeth expressed:

"If the assassination
Could trammel up the consequence, and catch
With his surcease success; that but this blow
Might be the be-all and the end-all here;
But here, upon this bank and shoal of time,
We'd jump the life to come. But in these cases
We still have judgment here, that we but teach
Bloody instructions, which being taught, return
To plague the inventors."

Judge Gary is getting his judgment here. His bloody invention has returned to plague him. His action has been reversed by the executive. The bourgeois newspapers have ceased to endorse it. The infamous Merritt statute, passed to give his crime in an irregular manner that sanction which in a regular manner could not have been given, has been repealed. His interpretation of the law of conspiracy was rejected when offered as a precedent in the Cronin case. The governor, the legislature, the press, the supreme court itself—eating its own words and his—have proclaimed that he committed a judicial murder. His last stroke is to pretend he did not know it for one. And this is how he succeeds:

"Mixed," he says, "with all the approval of my own part in the conviction of the Anarchists, that has come to my eyes and ears—the amount of which is beyond my summing up—there has been an undertone, like a minor strain in music, that if I had a little strained the law, I was to be commended for my courage in doing so."

Why what's the matter with that, Judge? You are commended; you have been twice re-elected; you have your palatial mansion, your salary and your applause "past summing up." What more do you want? "Peace, peace!" like Orestes, perhaps? Well, a man of seventy-seven must soon have that—if death ends all. Ah! but suppose it doesn't? "Ay, there's the rub!" It is this tremendous possibility which has always made that "minor strain" a wearing thing to hear.

"The lyreless lay of the Furies is withering to mankind." On the continent of Europe, where cases of this sort are more common than elsewhere, the horrible observation has been made that those judges who take the lives of Anarchists die insane. It was reserved for an American to tell us why. The multitude who participate in these murders can be expected to feel no remorse. They don't know what Anarchists are. But the judges who try Anarchists do know.

"I have occasionally," says Judge Gary, "almost lost sight of the atrocity of the advice given by the Anarchists, and felt a sort of sympathy for their writers. . . . The active leaders were men who fascinated, apparently, those with whom they came in contact. Men and women of a higher order of intelligence, of pure lives, amiable in their own disposition, seemed under a spell to them."

Ah! It requires some force of character to resist that spell—the same which so charmed the murderer of Stephen that he lived to wear a crown surpassing Stephen's own! The whole world's applause is not enough for such an effort if that "minor strain" runs through. The great actor must affect to think he does right, but the gallery gods are under no obligation to conceal that what they praise him for is doing wrong. And thus with their plaudits mingles the infernal chant of all the dead and damned, exulting over a fresh wickedness to countenance their own deeds, and another spirit coming their own way!

High their meagre arms they wave,
Loud their notes of welcome swell!
"Welcome, traitor, to the grave!
Perjured, bid the light farewell."

It is in a different way from this that the prospect of eternity affected those whom we are here to honor. When Fischer stood on the fatal platform, and the death cap had been lowered over his face he exclaimed, "This is happiest moment of my life!" Why was it the happiest? Surely, because whatever he may have believed before, there burst upon him an actual vision of that reward reserved for "the love which will be annihilated rather than be treacherous" and thereby "proclaims itself no mortal, but a native of the depths of absolute and inextinguishable being."

The eleventh of November returns. The sun rises, faint and cold, upon the ostrogs of Saghalien. He traverses, in his westward journey, the frozen plains of Siberia, and at every gathering of exiles under the suspicious eye of tyranny, he finds the memory which he brings held dear. In the freer countries he sees no city where this occasion is not celebrated as a triumph of freedom's indomitable spirit over the last resort of kings. He leaves our continent, and his evening rays have faded from it, when for the last time, he rides high over the Australian bush; and even there, in every mart of trade which fronts the sea, and every village where the shepherds meet, he finds men gathered to commemorate these heroes' deed. These deathless ones have made their exit in a blaze of glory; amidst the applause of a circle on which that sun never sets. Only in those Cimmerian regions to which his rays have never come, can their murderers find refuge from the execration of posterity.

The martyrs of Anarchism are so many and so glorious that it appears invidious to select. But already the world has decided to bestow a special palm on these. Theirs was the decisive battle; theirs the irreversible conquest, torn from the jaws of death. They were so absolutely innocent, it was so wholly impossible to make out they died for anything but their opinions; that millions who never heard of those opinions before began considering seriously what they could be to inspire such devotion. The effect is seen in that prodigious increase of Anarchism which the bourgeois no longer affect to ignore or to deny, and which they are equally impotent to arrest. The measures adopted to destroy these comrades of ours were of that desperate kind which are good only to be used once, and which the boldest will not propose repeating. Their success appalled their contrivers, and made them actually beg the martyrs to save their lives by stultifying their record. When they refused, and nothing remained but to immolate them, it was clear that in doing so, the conspiracy against their principles must equally immolate itself. To them we owe it that we meet this day in safety; that all over the globe there are other comrades assembling by hundreds of thousands, and not by hundreds, as eleven years ago.

Crown then, not with cypress but laurel, these brows protected by honor from the waste of time! Here is the brave old man whose voice rang, at his last moment, to the highest tower of the Bastile in which he died. Here is a youth who sipped at the cup of death, and paused before the draining to pronounce it nectar. Here is the self-offered victim whom love itself could not withhold from the arms of death and duty. And here is he who had escaped their fate, but chose to share it rather than to shirk; an oblation which will be told about aright when men and women meet in freedom's cause, to die no longer, but to subdue the earth!

"Thy name our charging hosts along
Shall be their battle-word!
Thy fame, the theme of choral song
From virgin voices poured!
To weep would do thy glory wrong,
Thou shalt not be deplored."

The Story of "Ideala"

BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

In thirty years of reading of miscellaneous literature, including Fox's "Book of Martyrs," and modern yellow journals, I have read nothing more shocking, more terrible, more perfectly depicting the refinement of unconscious cruelty than Sarah Grand's story of "Ideala." It is the story of the crucifixion of a woman's heart on the cross of conventional morality. It is ostensibly written in defense of the conventional code of morality, for the author says:

"There must be moral laws, and it is inevitable that they should press hardly on individuals occasionally; but it is clearly the duty of individuals to sacrifice themselves for the good of the community at large."

I say it is ostensibly written to bolster up conventional morality, but I am almost ready to believe it is in reality intended as a just and stinging rebuke to society for its meddling with which it has no shadow of a right to interfere. The author is too wise a woman not to know that the logic of the heroine "Ideala" is in no way met by the sophistry of the teller of the story, and she is also wise enough to know that a triumph for conventional morality was necessary to gain a wide circulation for her book. The defeat and heart crucifixion of the brave heroine is a masterpiece of art, because it shows the shallowness of the excuses society can give for its continuous record of tragedies. One reviewer says of the book:

"Her story is a brief and familiar one; she is tempted to leave a brutal and unfaithful husband for the protection of the man she loves, but is prevented from taking the step through the wise counsel of a friend."

"Wise counsel," indeed! Let us read a little of it:

"After dinner she brought the conversation round to those social laws which govern our lives arbitrarily. I did not see what she was driving; neither did the good old bishop, who was one of the party; nor a lawyer who was also present.

"'I want to know if a thing can be legally right and morally wrong?' Ideala asked.

"'Of course not,' the bishop rashly asserted.

"'That depends,' the lawyer said cautiously.

"'If I signed a contract,' Ideala explained, 'and found out afterward that the one who induced me to become a party to it had kept me in ignorance of the most important clause in it, so that I really did not know to what I was committing myself, would you call that a moral contract?'

"'I should say that people had not dealt uprightly with you,' the bishop answered; 'but there might be nothing in the clause to which you could object.'

"'But suppose there was something in the clause to which I very strongly objected, something of which my whole conscience disapproved, something that was repugnant to my whole moral nature; and suppose I was forced by law to fulfill it nevertheless, should you say that was a moral contract? Should you not say that in acting against my conscience I acted immorally?'

"We all fell into the trap and looked an encouraging assent.

"'And, in that case,' she continued, 'I suppose my duty would be to evade the law, and act on my conscience?'

"The bishop looked puzzled.

"'I should be only doing what the early martyrs had to do,' she added.

"'That is true,' he rejoined, with evident relief.

"'But I don't see what particular contract you are talking of,' said the lawyer.

"'The marriage contract,' Ideala answered calmly.

"The announcement created a sensation. The lawyer laughed; the bishop looked grave.

"'Oh, but you can't describe marriage that way,' he declared with emphasis.

"'Humph!' the lawyer observed meditatively. 'I am afraid I must beg to differ from your lordship. Many women might describe their marriage in that way with perfect accuracy.'

"'Marriages are made in Heaven,' the bishop ejaculated feebly.

"'Let us hope that some are, dear bishop,' Claudia sweetly observed, and all the married people in the room looked 'Amen' at her."

Ideala then gives her idea of marriage, concluding by saying:

"A marriage without love is an immoral contract."

"Marriage an immoral contract!" the bishop exclaimed. "Oh, dear! Oh, dear! This is not right, you know—this is not at all right. I remember you said something like it once before and really it is not a subject to joke about. Such an idea is quite pernicious; it must not be allowed to spread, even as a joke. I wish, my dear, you had not promulgated it, even in that spirit. You have—ah—a knack of making things seem plausible and of giving weight to opinions by the way you express them, although the opinions themselves are quite erroneous, as on the present occasion. Some of your ideas are so very mistaken, you know; and you really ought to leave these matters to those who understand them and can judge."

Understand them and can judge! Who can understand them and judge them better than a woman whose whole nature has been outraged by them? Ideala not only believes she can not live without Lorrimer, but she also believes she is necessary for his happiness and for the development of the latent possibilities of his nature. Hear her:

"To be a Pericles I see that man must have an Aspasia. Was Aspasia vile? Some said so—yet she did a nobler work, and was finer in her fall, if she fell, than many good women in all the glory of uprightness are. And was she impure? then it is strange that her mind was not corrupting in its influence. And was she low? then whence came her power to raise others? It seems to me that it only rests with ourselves to make any position in life, which circumstances render it expedient for us to occupy, desirable."

"And you propose to be an Aspasia to this modern Pericles?"

"If you like to put it so. The cases are not dissimilar, as there was an obstacle in the way of their marriage also."

"The law was the obstacle."

"Yes; another of those laws which are more honored in the breach than in the observance. They might not marry because she came from Miletus, and Lorrimer may not marry me because I came out of the house of bondage. Unwise laws make immoral nations."

And then the story writer asks her: "Have you never felt that what you are doing is wrong?"

"I cannot say that exactly," she answered. "I knew that certain social conventions forbid the thing—at least I began to acknowledge this to myself after a time. At first, you know, I thought of nothing. I was wholly absorbed in my desire to see him; that excluded every other consideration. Do you know what it is to be sure a thing is wrong, and yet not able to feel it so—to have your reason acknowledge what your conscience does not confirm?"

Oh the wisdom of ignorance in that naive inquiry! "Sure" it is wrong because she has been taught so; unable to feel it is wrong because her intuition tells her she has been taught a lie—a revolting, an outrageous lie. The author goes on to say:

"After she found that her husband had broken every tie, disregarded every obligation, legal and moral that bound her to him, she seems to have considered herself free. [What sane person could blame her?] When the time came she never questioned her right to act on this fancied freedom."

Aye, verily, "fancied freedom," for she was not yet free from the dominion of her "wise counselors," not yet free from a lingering superstitious fear of conventionality which had enslaved her all her life and her ancestors for centuries before her birth. But the rebellion of a true woman's nature against this galling, dwarfing thralldom is too realistically depicted by Sarah Grand for her not to know its appalling results. So I am forced to see the keen, scathing blade of satire ensheathed in this lame and puerile excuse she offers as an apology to the blind and ignorant slaves of conventionality, meanwhile laughing in her sleeve—or perhaps weeping for the folly of her fellow women:

"The restrictions which men and women have seen fit to place upon their intercourse with one another are the outcome of ages of experience and they who disregard them bring upon themselves the troubles against which these same restrictions, irksome at times as they must be, are the only adequate defence."

While such women as Ideala live in the bondage of conventional slavery—and there are thousands of them—surely there is a field for such educational papers as Lucifer the Light Bearer.

Do you know such a woman? If so, give her "Ideala" to read; and after she has finished it, give her a few copies of Lucifer.

Old Lovers and Young.

BY ROMULUS.

When Jack Callow, aged twenty-two, and Susan Elder, aged thirty-four, fell in love, and in the enthusiasm of the moment decided to take upon themselves the holy bonds of matrimony, Jack's chums, Tom and Fred, thus relieved their minds:

Tom: Jack may find it endurable for a year or two, but when he's in the prime of life he'll be mighty sorry he's hitched to an old woman for all his days.

Fred: Yes, deuced sorry. A man's a fool, anyway, who doesn't take a woman at least four or five years younger than himself.

Tom: You are right. It's the young girls that make married life worth living for a fellow. Going to see the "Black Crook" to-night?

As for Susan's intimate fritnds, Maud and Julia, they expressed themselves as follows:

Maud: Say, Mary, have you heard the latest? Susan Elder is actually going to marry that boy, Jack Callow.

Julia: Well, I never! How perfectly foolish! Why he's twelve years younger than she is. How on earth a woman can marry a man younger than herself is more than I can see.

Maud: So say I. She must be crazy. The very idea! Say, Julia, are these ribbons becoming?

Several hundred thousand years ago, more or less, when primitive man went out in search of a wife, and solemnized the first marriage with the aid of a club and a stone, the foundation was laid for the remarks above chronicled.

Admitting, as every intelligent person must admit, that marriage originated, and is even now largely maintained, by the superior physical strength of the male, it follows that the institution, in its laws and customs, very nearly suits the desires of the aforesaid male. It is a familiar social edict concerning marriage that the wife shall be younger than the husband, and if we go back to primitive conditions we find that this edict had its origin in the fact that when the would-be husband went out with his club (the prototype of the modern marriage certificate) to select a bride, he invariably and naturally chose the most attractive girl he could lay hands upon—one who was young and pretty. Those women who were unfortunate (or fortunate) enough not to be clubbed into the matrimonial state soon came to be looked upon by their comrades as not sufficiently attractive to win a lover, and when a man clubbed a woman older than himself, the proceeding was looked upon askance for the reason that it was naturally supposed the man had chosen her in lieu of the younger and more desirable one that he could not get, owing to the competition of his fellows. Hence, for a woman to be married to a younger man was looked upon as involving disgrace for both—disgrace for the man, because he could get no younger mate, and disgrace for the woman because she was the last resort of the man. Thus it is that both sexes have united in condemning the union of a man with an older woman, and in applauding that of a man and a younger woman.

In this respect, are the laws of nature in accordance with the laws of man? Is it true that women are never pleased with the attentions of a young lover? When it is a matter of free choice, do they invariably prefer the wrinkled veteran to the youthful soldier in love's warfare? Let every woman, radical or otherwise, who reads this endeavor to cast aside the prejudices of generations, consider the matter calmly, and make answer to herself according to her convictions. Is it not possible that if woman had instituted marriage, not man, the young husband would have been the rule today, instead of the young wife?

If woman had gone forth with love in her heart and a club in her hand to seek out a lover, would she have ignored youth and swung her weapon at the head of an ancient of days, in order most joyously to enter upon love's young dream? If so the present marriage system is partially vindicated; if not, natural longings have been stifled in millions of women's breasts, that man might gather to his own selfishness.

Another bulwark of the old-man-young-woman marriage arose in the desire of the parents to know their own children, and the consequent establishment of the family. Other things being equal, that family was most stable which had the strongest and most capable man at its head; and woman, naturally desiring stability in her only means of support, was compelled to seek a "protector" as well as a lover—if it is proper to use the verb "seek" when the nearest approach to a choice in the matter was that which arose when civilization advanced so far that woman was allowed the privilege of refusing to be clubbed either with a billet of wood or a certificate billet of paper, by the first barbarian who took a fancy to her.

When in the future the time comes that love has liberty, it may be that women will as freely seek young lovers as men do now; and it may be that many women by their loveliness of character and form will win and hold the affections of men far their juniors; and it may be that men will in the same way be loved by women young enough to be their daughters, and still in the flush of girlhood—yet all will be considered natural and beautiful; and it may then be esteemed an honor for a woman to be so much a woman that young men cleave to her, and a privilege for a man to be so much a man that he is beloved by young girls; and in that day it may be that the trail of the monogamous serpent will be so nearly effaced from the land that youth will not avoid age through fear of the future, and age will not forego the love of youth because of cackling tongues. In that day love may go where it wills without responsibility, for the love of a true woman or a true man is its own responsibility.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Joseph Corna, Spring Valley, Ills.,—Enclosed you will find ninety cents, wishing it were a thousand dollars for the great New Ideal. Please send me a hundred copies of the report of the speeches of our comrades, Dr. Morris Schultz and C. L. James.

James Vincent, Sr., Tabor, Iowa.—I was glad when I saw in the last Lucifer that you thought of going off somewhere for a rest, though I was sorry to learn that you needed it. But feeble, overworked nature will not be imposed on. Now I want to tell you of one of the best places to rest that I have found, and you may let your readers know too, if you have room. It is at the Mineral Springs, Burlington Junction, Missouri, conducted by Dr. S. Black. Those needing rest will find it restful, and those needing common sense treatment will find it. I have seen patients, especially afflicted with rheumatism, who could only step a few inches at a time, with help, get well and walk off six or seven miles and think nothing of it. Another who could not help himself at all but had to be wheeled around got well and hearty, but let me say, many patients get it into their heads that all they need to do is to go to some such health resort for a week and go home cured. This is a mistake. Patients going there or anywhere else for treatment must make up their minds to give to nature ample time for repairs. I have been there frequently and think of going again soon, not for treatment but just because I want to, and if any of your readers want rest or common sense treatment or to restore health, that is the place I would recommend. I recommend your readers, those who can, to send you in addition to their subscription a dollar with instructions to go off and get your strength. And here is mine to go where I recommend or where else you please. Your friend, "An Old Fogy."

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," R. G. I will pay railroad fare if necessary. Address H, care Lucifer.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalisation of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 15 cents.

Our Martyrs.

BY WILL HUBBARD-KENSAN.

Inscribed to Dr. J. H. Greer, Chicago, Ill.
(Written in Honor of Parsons and His Compatriots.)

The Law hath strangled Liberty within our lovely land—
No longer do our Peoplehood their destinies command,
But Syndicates
And foreign states
Control our country now,
And the voter is a vassal with a brand upon his brow;
The brand is this: "$1.00"—meaning "I am bought" or "sold,"
Mayhap the price was silver and mayhap the price was gold;
It matters not, good gentlemen, to either you or me—
The one, eternal fact remains: WE ARE NO LONGER FREE!

But a danger-bell is ringing with a harsh, portentious clang,
Ten as a century ago, o'er shuddering France it rang!
And though our Rockefellers, Yerkes, and Vanderbilts today
Though their President and Congress and their courts hold sovereign sway,
They shall fall, as fell King Louis and his Queen and courtiers, too,
Though they sneak behind the banner of the Red and White and Blue!
Ours shall be one color only—Man, that symbolizes all—
Man, the color resting proudly over every Martyr's pall—
Man, that stands for Man's Redemption, for his Rights and for his Wrath!
Man, that leads the Races upward on the one, Progressive Path!

O, the glorious men and women who have died for Truths Divine!
O, the splendor of the laurels on their bright, supernal shrine!
Christ and Socrates and Bruno, Nathan Hale, and, grand as they,
Parsons and his gallant comrades, whom the Bastards slew one day.
Ah! the mighty Host of Martyrs! If there is a Future, they Will receive its radiant roses in the Fair and Far Away!

I would rather be the meanest reptile dragging through the slime,
Destined to no evolution through the sum and sweep of Time—
Than be Pilate or his prototypes whose souls are rankly red
With the blood of the dead Martyrs—but, thank God! THEY ARE NOT DEAD!
As Christ lived! As Bruno lived! as all those Heroes high
Lived in the Past, they're living now—their deeds can never die.

You cannot kill immortal Truth; its vital force and fire
Survives the wreck of Æons—leaping higher still and higher!
Though I die,
And you die—
Our cause will brightly burn
Through all the Cataclysms of tumultuous Time eterne;
And every drop of human blood that falls for Liberty
Will rise into consummate flower through Cycles yet to be!

I would rather lie under the roses tonight
That were strewn by strong, splendorful spirits today,
Than live in the luxuries, languors and light
Of demagog drifting to damnedest decay!

Our martyrs will never grow old! They will grow
Into height a more heroic—their names shall increase
In honor, until every nation shall know
Our Parsons and Engel and Fischer and Spies!

As the name of John Brown rang the doom of his foes,
In memory thrillant, their names yet shall ring.
In a new "Marseillaise," that forever will close
The Reign of all Rulers—each King, Clique or King!

And Man shall be his own Boss, Lord and God—
Shall follow no Leader—shall bow to no nod:
But shall take from his Self his own Law and own Light,
For man shall be ruler, and Right shall be Might!

Labor Martyrs Remembered.

[Address in German delivered by Moritz Shultz, Nov. 11, '98, at the Memorial Meeting in Chicago].

Friends: On the 11th day of November, 1887, there were put to death in this city five men who, as long as men shall be deprived of justice and freedom, will be looked upon as martyrs in the cause of freedom.

Spies, Parsons, Fischer, Lingg, and Engel will live for all time to come in the heart of the revolutionary proleteriat. And long after those who by a shameful, dishonorable trial condemned them to death and brought them to the gallows, have been buried and forgotten, the memory of our dead will live and will never be blotted out.

It is not my intention to discuss in detail the trial of our eight comrades, neither will I review the scenes under the gallows, for there cannot be one among you but has heard again and again from this platform all those terrible tales.

However, for today let us contemplate the 11th of November from another standpoint—a standpoint which our dead friends, were they living, would take, and which, I am sure, will emphasize the position of the departed among this assemblage more strongly than could mere expressions of sorrow and regret.

Thus far, in every 11th of November address have I heard of the unfair trial, of the subversion of right, of the parody on justice, of the cruel murder of the innocent, and like things; and justly so. For never was right defied more openly, never was justice prostituted worse, than in the trial of our eight comrades.

But for all that I believe that in a manner we are wronging the representatives of a present society. The sorrow over the loss of comrades dims our judgment and weakens the force of our argument. Right and justice are very elastic conceptions, and the ruling classes of our time will be the last to apply to these concepts the standard of common sense or of sentimentality.

But I go farther and maintain that our martyrs were not as guiltless as depicted by many November speakers. Spies and his companions were leaders of the people, and leaders of the people have invariably been hanged when thereby a revolutionary movement could be headed off.

My friends, this world is not governed by sentiment but by reason, yes, by cold, calculating reason. Self-interest, not pity, decides the action of our lawgivers. The ruling classes of all times have been guided solely by their class interests, and whatever these class interests seemed to demand they have done, and that with an iron hand and remorseless serverity.

The ruling class at all times has succeeded in suppressing the voice of conscience whenever the "majesty of law," that is their class interests, made it necessary. But the proletariat has ever been guided almost wholly by the voice of its heart; and on this rock of sentimentalism, as I would term it, nearly all popular uprisings and revolutions have foundered.

And, believe me, my friends, no one knows this better than the ruling class itself. It knows well enough that the people, like unto a mighty giant, is invincible when once it arises in mass and raises its ponderous fist for the blow. But it also knows that this giant is like a child, a good-natured, amiable child, whose anger is easily dispelled by a handful of sweets, a few pennies.

When the deception has been consummated and the uprising scattered, then after the sweetcake follows the knout, and they whose interests were menaced are sure to revenge themselves. Then perhaps the giant discovers the fraud, but instead of seriously considering how it is that he could so stupidly permit himself to be cheated he devotes himself to sorrowfully angry reflections on the treachery of his opponents and the injustice of the world.

The friends of our eight murdered heroes behaved in a sorrowfully angry manner when they heard of the incarceration and butchery of their comrades. It is no exaggeration to say that on the 11th of November more than one hundred thousand proletarian hearts were constricted with impotent pain and swore to avenge the wrong inflicted upon the entire laboring class. How many tears flowed in those days, how many sacred oaths were voiced, how many hands closed themselves into fists—where is the man who could count them? And when the bodies of the murdered ones were being carried to Waldheim, when one hundred thousand laborers bore the remains of the executed in triumphal march through the city's streets, then enthusiasm seized this mighty throng and grand and magnificent we saw the majesty of the people.

Then followed the reaction. The enthusiasm evaporated, the oaths of revenge became silent, and—the bourgeoisie by lightning message informed the world: Anarchy is dead!

It is not my purpose now to preach morals. But a fool is he who with hollow phrases would deceive himself as to his own strength or weakness. And truly, weak were our friends, and weak they who bore them to Waldheim. Solitary and misunderstood by the great mass of the American people, they had been dreaming of the triumph of a grand cause until the minions of power came and brought to a terrible ending the noble, but premature undertaking.

"Anarchy is dead!" Thus said the capitalistic press.

Well, my friends, anarchy is not dead, nor do I believe that it ever will die.

What the bourgeoisie did kill on the 11th of November, 1887, were a few representatives of the anarchistic idea; what it did suppress was an organization not yet fully ripened. But the words of August Spies, "Our silence in the grave will be mightier than all our speeches," remain true for all time. Through its martyrs Christianity has conquered the world; through its martyrs science has prospered and grown powerful; through the example of heroism Napoleon won his greatest battles; and through the heroism of our own martyrs the idea of Anarchism will gain support. And as Freiligrath puts into the mouth of revolution, so I put into the mouth of Anarchy the words:

> Ye fools, do not I then dwell e'en where your power ends?
> Do not I find safest shelter behind every brow, in every heart
> In every workshop where the hammer sounds,
> In every cot where sighs of anguish rise?
> Am not I humanity's breath, that ceaselessly for freedom pants?

No, my friends, Anarchy is not the fantastic creation of a few hot-blooded cranks, as the bourgeoisie would make us believe. Neither is Anarchy synonymous with social disorder and violence. It is rather the emblem of an idea than which none more exalted and beautiful can be conceived. It presupposes that men respect and love each other and do not govern one another. It is a religion of the new time in which there will be neither master nor servant. Absolved from all superstitious fancies, free from the fetters of material wants, the man of the era of Anarchism will immeasurably surpass, both physically and mentally, his progenitors.

Anarchism is the embodiment of absence of government, law, rule—the necessary demand or condition of freedom. No man is free who is ruled by another, as no one is truly free who rules over others.

If we ask how it was possible for man to sink so deep into servitude the answer must be that primarily this came about by the invention of personal property. Every kind of non-freedom results from economic independence. While man kept possession of the product of his labor he was free; the moment he lost this he also lost his freedom.

If, then, Anarchism is to be realized, economic slavery, the outgrowth of the capitalistic system must be removed. And because all Anarchists, i. e, those who do not contemplate Anarchism merely from a philosophic standpoint, are conscious of this necessity, therefore they are hated so intensely by the representatives of our present social system.

Messrs. Spies, Parsons, Fischer, Lingg and Engel were not executed for preaching philosophic Anarchism, but for preaching that practical Anarchism which demands the conversion of all private into societary property.

Modern bourgeoisie considers every one who attacks its proprietary rights as its mortal enemy whom it will relentlessly prosecute until he has been made harmless.

Our eight comrades had attacked the rights of possession of the rulers, therefore, they must pay with their lives. So long as the laboring people quarrel about paper rights, placing themselves upon the ground of the legal state, they are let alone. When, however, they presume to stretch out their hands towards those rights—concerning property coupled with possession, all tolerance in the opposing camp ceases and war is the inevitable consequence.

Many persons experience a cold shiver when the word Anarchy is only pronounced. And has not the capitalistic press taken good care that our simple-minded citizens entertain the most distorted notions concerning Anarchism? These simple-minded people expect an Anarchist to do all the wicked, horrible things it is possible to think of. Anarchists are incendiaries, thieves and infamous characters in general, while Anarchy to them means a condition of universal disorder and insecurity.

I do not claim, of course, that there are no black sheep among Anarchists, men who dishonor the name they have falsely assumed. But how about the other side? What, for instance, are the component elements of our great political parties? Do we not hear it during every election campaign that the candidates, no matter for what office they may run are very bad men? Let us take, as an example, the highest executive officer of this state—Governor Tanner. There was nothing too atrocious to say of him by his opponents. Even his former friends have depicted him as a corrupt man through and through, charging him with about every crime in the calendar. Despite, or rather by virtue of this malodorous representation, this fellow succeeded in beating at the polls his adversary Altgeld, who by comparison is a respectable man. This instance illustrates how all-powerful are corruptionists of this country and how politically unripe are the American people. There are few men placed by the people of this country in responsible public positions who differ materially from Governor Tanner.

In no other country of the world are the people made sport of more than in these United States of America. Whosoever here devotes himself to politics is actuated by selfish motives. To grow fat and wealthy at the federal and municipal cribs is —with possibly a very few exceptions—the aim of every political aspirant. Every one thinks but of his own self, determined to gain wealth at the expense of the working and tax-paying people.

How much rascality and vileness, how much deception, falsehood and treachery is engendered and perpetrated in political circles of this kind only he may comprehend who has followed up and truly understood political life.

But not alone the active members of the political parties, not alone the representatives of the people are corrupted by such a system. I assert that the character of the whole people suffers beyond measure thereby. The corruption penetrates to the lowermost stratum, vitiating, poisoning all moral and refined life. Is it not time that among the burglars and prowling thieves in our larger cities one frequently encountered influential politicians? Was not at one time the honorable Michael Schaack in secret collusion with the owners of brothels and such ilk? Are not the majority of our city aldermen absolutely depraved tools of wealthy corporations?

Can it be otherwise under our present organization of society? It is a fact long known and often repeated by all right-minded and clear-thinking observers, that politics spoil the character of men.

[To be concluded next week].

An Attempt to Rationalize Marriage.

[The following statement of what purports to be a marriage contract was sent us some time ago by a good friend and helper whose home is in Iowa. He does not tell us whether an officer of the state or church administered the usual nuptial oaths, promises, or not; whether a license to marry was issued by the probate court, or whether the usual record was made in the archives of the county. Perhaps our friend will enlighten us on these points later on].

IN LOVE—TO AN ADVANCING HUMANITY:

In order to make more certain our future happiness, comfort and prosperity, we A., B., of Blankville, Iowa, and C. D., of same town and state, do agree that we are parties of the first part, and respondent recipient parties of the second part to this contract, which expresses our agreements, conclusions and understandings for beginning and continuing our co-operation for the procreative, sociological and industrial relations of life.

In consideration of Love, Confidence and Affection, be it therefore understood, witnessed and remembered, that each pledges to the other the sincerest conscience and personal honor during the continuance of our co-operation, which is understood to include, if need be, the equitable adjustment of all material affairs if a settlement be desired before either's death.

We recognize marriage as a legal union defined by man-made statutes and we conform to its prescribed form and ceremony for the sole and only purpose of protecting ourselves from prosecution (and our children, if any, from the obloquy of that other man made term, "bastard") for assuming a relationship that we believe to be among our personal rights. For this one purpose we yield to the prescribed forms of "the law." Our marriage as thus defined, is but our contract with society to be at peace with it.

OUR WEDDED STATUS

is the contract between ourselves, and in it we recognize freedom and equality during the life of the love that this day brings us together. For that period we undertake all conditions and qualifications of life; all hopes and fears; all joys and sorrows, all pleasures and pains. Believing that happiness and home comforts as conditions of living become automatic whenever and so long as the sex aura, male and female, holds harmonic communion. During its reign we have no fears to entertain; no pledges to exact; no commands to give; no powers to serve; nothing to question or to decide. We recognize no authority greater than the attractive influence that we reflect; therefore, neither of us surrenders a single personal privilege, desire, inclination, habit, custom, belief or action that is not responsive to the commingling sex force between us. We believe that life, either physical, mental or spiritual, originates by the joining of male and female conditions [forces?] of the positive and negative kind. For that reason we declare that personal freedom shall in nowise be abridged or restrained, other than by the individual's conscience.

The going out of the Light and Love that today brings us together, will, of itself, terminate the co-operation between us, and we bind ourselves with agreements and stipulations to SETTLE AND SEPARATE.

In equity and freedom we recognize the mother's superior right to her children, and with that recognition we leave the future consideration for them, if any, to the particular time and occasions that may arise; realizing the impossibility of adjusting personal rights (as to third parties) before they exist. Either party to this contract may seek and obtain a cancellation of the legal contract with society, which the other agrees not to oppose.

We agree that all rights, titles and interests in property, of every kind and description, now owned individually, shall become the joint property of both, but if the co-operation terminates by the death of either party, the survivor shall immediately become the sole and absolute owner of all property then owned jointly or severally by either or both of us. During the continuance of our co-operation all accumulations of whatsoever kind or description shall be owned share and share alike, which shall constitute the rule for division whenever made, after the joint expenditures have been paid.

As in a like co-partnership, neither partner shall be considered responsible for the individual wants, desires, inclinations, contracts, debts or demands of the other, beyond the joint co-operative, communicative, responsive, reciprocal life that the wedded contemplate, and that which united souls attain. Heirs and representatives we should not bind and do not attempt to do so.

In conclusion we reiterate our studied determination to fulfill every effort for happiness under this contract so long as the power within us lives—expressing a hope that it will be for the term of our lives. To all of which we ask the people to bear witness while we attest by our willing hands and hopeful hearts.

Dated, signed and entered into this —— day of ——, nineteen hundred and ——, at —— —— ——.

Marriage and Divorce.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Instead of putting forth all our energies to destroy the marriage laws, or make martyrs of ourselves, our children and our friends, why not work for the same end by sure steps, even if a little slower ones.

Make marriage and divorce simple contracts, and the one as easily dissolved as the other. The more I read of the general news of the world, as well as learn through private correspondence, the more I see of the horrors of enforced companionship between husband and wife. Murders innumerable are resorted to to free one or the other from unwelcome bonds, and no doubt the number of murders never found out, even exceed those that are divorced. And other thousands bears the ills they see no honorable way of avoiding.

We live for happiness, and should each and all work for it in some feasible way. Begin with something simple and gradually grow into higher and better things.

A large majority of the men and women who respond to call for names for the correspondence circle are unhappily married. In private letters one gets the innermost feelings of the heart. So many couples who pass and pose to the world as contented with their selection, as are "on to ragged edge" and longing for freedom.

Theology has discarded the old-time hell of fire and brimstone, and sociology should discard the irrevocable marriage contract and replace it by one of union at the will of the parties.

> O the puzzle, the thrice tied knot, the deep and dark pool, united and chained!
> O, to speed where there is space enough, and air enough to last!
> To be absolved from previous ties and connections, I from mine and you from yours!
> To find a new unthought-of consonance with the best of Nature.
> —Whitman.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, 51 Arundel Square, London, N., England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE ANNUAL CONVENTION of the American Secular Union was held at Washington Hall in this city ending its session on Sunday evening Nov. 20. President J. E. Remsburg of Atchison, Kansas, presided at most of the sessions of the convention. The old officers were re-elected. Further reports of the lectures and other proceedings of the convention will probably appear in next week's issue.

THE PROMISED translation of Doctor Schultz's address failed to reach us in time for full insertion in this week's Lucifer, so that we are obliged to divide it, giving half this week and half next. There is no danger, however, that it will spoil by keeping. Extra large editions of the three issues containing the two principal addresses and reports of the November Memorial Meeting are being printed so that all may obtain copies who desire to keep them for reference. or to distribute them to those who are yet in darkness as to the true character and aims of the men who, eleven years ago, in Chicago, gave up their lives in defense of their opinions. Price in bundles of one hundred copies ninety cents—or fifteen cents per dozen.

Free Speech in Cincinnati.

Is thirteen an "unlucky" number? According to the Cincinnati "Post," the Chief of Police of that city wanted to make it an unlucky date for me. It was announced that I would present Luciferian ideas to the Ohio Liberal Society on Sunday evening, November 13, and the "Post" gave a little sketch of my work and a portrait of me, and followed it with this statement.

"DANGEROUS SUBJECT—CHIEF DEITSCH WANTS TO KNOW IN ADVANCE WHAT MISS HARMAN WILL SAY.

"Lillian Harman, who is booked to lecture on 'Free Love' Sunday night, will have to submit her lecture to Chief Deitsch before she will be permitted to mount the platform.

"The Colonel was asked what would be done, and he said 'You see, I must know what she is going to say before the law can be called in to interfere.

"The subject is one that is dangerous to growing-up girls and boys, and I want to know what she is going to say. I will send for the woman and have a talk with her on the matter, and then I can determine, after a consultation with Mayor Tafel, what action should be taken."

I felt entirely willing that Mr. Deitsch should see my paper. I should have been very pleased to have him read it. However, he altered his mind, if it had ever been his intention to interfere, and there was no police interference of any kind.

The following is the report of the lecture as given in "The Cincinnati Enquirer:"

The meeting of the Ohio Liberal Society of last evening was perhaps one of the best in point of attendance in the history of that organization. Many came, no doubt, because they thought that they would hear a racy lecture by a woman, and some were on hand to witness a prospective police interference. However, neither of these things happened, and, although the lecture contained a few broad statements, clothed in becoming language, no one's sensibilities were rudely shocked. Plenty of amusement was furnished by the asking of questions and the general criticisms which followed the lecture.

The lecturer of the evening was Lillian Harman, of Chicago co-editor of Lucifer. Her subject was "Woman's Place in Evolution." This was a discourse on and in favor of free love, not exactly in its broadest sense, but merely as regards natural selection. She gave us to understand that to those who really loved each other it would matter little whether or not there was a marriage license in existence. Her lecture was too general and diluted with interpolations of alleged horrible examples of the present marriage state that weakened its force and intent. However, she spoke well and was attentively listened to by those present.

The speaker started out by recounting the alleged evils of the present social system. She said that woman ought to have a right not only to choose her husband, but be on an equality with him. She said that according to the present mode a woman has to stick to her husband and cannot get a divorce from him unless he commits a crime of some sort. It is her belief that because a married woman, especially a mother, has to bear the real burdens of married life she should not be compelled to submit so easily to man in all of his caprices. The lecturer irrelevantly brought in a comparison of Christian Scientists and the regular medical profession. She merely did this to prove that the Scientists might be no worse than the other medicos. The present marriage laws, she asserted, prevent natural selection, and that they increase vices of the worst kind. She does not believe in the idea of persons waiting until they are twenty-five years or over before getting married. If a law to that effect were generally promulgated it wou'd increase the number of children who would be unable to trace their parentage.

The present marriage laws entrap women, because the men, to whom the women look for protection and support, and who make all kinds of promises, are not liable to live up to them. She said that women ought to have the same rights as men and be responsible for them. She thought it the best thing in the world for parents to throw aside all prudery and let their children know exactly what marriage means, and not make mysteries of the marriage state, as is done now. Miss Harman wound up by telling a chapter of her life history. She was enamored of a man and was willing to become his common law wife. For this she was thrown into prison, and because she did not pay the fine assessed she remained incarcerated six months. She believes there was nothing wrong in her manner of living, and thought she had a right to assert her own right.

The criticisms which followed were more or less amusing. Many thought that the present marriage state was all right, but that a solution of the social evil could be found in several ways, most prominent of which were to make all persons good and to vote the Socialistic Labor Party ticket at all elections. A lawyer present told of how twenty years ago he defended a murderer, and then went on to describe a shipwreck, in which he told of a wife's plea for the life of her husband, who was about to be cut up into choice sirloin stakes to feed a famishing party in a lifeboat way out at sea. He said that a sail hove in sight, but whether this was due to her pleadings or not he left to conjecture. Another man told of how he was married according to the orthodox Hebrew custom, which does not require a marriage license; of how he went abroad for a little over a year, and when he returned home his wife had run away with another man. He wanted a remedy for such things. The lecturer in turn answered all to the best of her ability.

The reporter was slightly "mixed" in several places, but on the whole he made a tolerably fair report. The allusion to my "life history" was not made in the lecture, but in reply to the statement made by a critic that we now have liberty—that I had taken the liberty to bear a child without having gone through the conventional marriage ceremony. I agreed that we had the liberty if we possessed the strength and endurance to take it and pay the cost, and went on to say what the cost had been in my case.

The discussion was very interesting, and I enjoyed answering the questions, though the reporter said that "only fool questions" were asked of me.

The Ohio Liberal Society is in a flourishing condition—a condition which to me seems due to their free discussion of all questions. On this occasion, the hall was filled though an admittance fee was charged. I shall long remember my visit to Cincinnati, and the friends I made in that city. L. H.

In Defence of Free Discussion

William Platt in the November "Adult."

A case like the Bedborough case serves unhappily to remind us of the loose manner with which so many persons regard principles which are the basis of some of the most important of our liberties. The principles of free discussion which is here at stake is so little realized that many persons imagine that because they differ from Mr. Bedborough they are entitled to disclaim the efforts that are made to save him from being punished for maintaining his controversial views. A few words on the logic of free discussion cannot, therefore, be regarded as out of place here. Historically speaking, punishment for free expression of opinion, though it has always been manifest in political matters, has been most notoriously outrageous in the sphere of religion. The inquisition and the massacre of Bartholomew's day, send even through the dead centuries a shudder that blanches the cheek of the modern student; they represent the principle of punishment for opinion carried to its extreme. Yet they could not serve to bolster up the Church of Rome—did they not rather help on its inevitable downfall? The organization that wielded the most terrible powers that belonged to any governing force known in the history of man, is today a shadow mocking its past magnificence, rapidly fading as its sun sets into well deserved nothingness. If persecution could ever save a cause, why is the Church of Rome no longer on its pedestal, why are its priests today so cautious and subservient?

Persecution never can save a cause; neither stake nor dungeon is any reply to an argument—there is only one reply and that is by counter-argument. Whoever persecutes instead of arguing has done his own cause the most damage, has given to his opponent no mortal blow, but only the widest of advertisements. Thinking men will ask "Why was he not answered, but prosecuted?" The man who replies to a word with a blow must give good reason indeed if he be not utterly discredited—what reason can this prosecution give us? "His theories will lead to harm" says the prosecution. Why so? If these theories are wrong and they are debated, surely they will be discredited and good will be done—only if violence be allowed to take the place of argument will issues become prejudiced on both sides, and harm be likely to accrue. The prosecution serves no purpose save to discredit its own supporters.

Take a broader issue. What human institution is there that is above criticism? Are they not all of them better for being criticised? Is our marriage system above criticism? If it is to be criticised (and it would be monstrous to suppose otherwise), it is surely clear that no condition can be made to debar certain views from entering into the debate—there is no "spot barred" in the game of logic. Freedom is an absolute necessity of critical thought. Free discussion thus becomes axiomatic, and its denial an absurdity. How can it possibly be logical to say "ere we allow free discussion we must settle whether certain views are harmful"—free discussion is needed ere even this point can be settled; and the objectors to the Free Press Committee are guilty therefore of the most grotesque self-stultification.

"Wives, Submit Yourselves Unto Your Husbands."

BY CYRUS W. COOLRIDGE.

In the New York "Herald" of November 13, appeared a clerical symposium on the question, shall the word "obey" be eliminated from the marriage ceremony? I presume there are very few readers of Lucifer who recognize the right of the church or of the state to regulate the relations of men to women, and who believe in the necessity of a marriage ceremony, even if they believe in monogamy; but it is interesting to know what our clerical friends have to say on this important subject.

It appears that nearly all of them are in favor of retaining the word "obey," although very few have courage enough to admit that obedience means obedience and nothing else. The Rev. Thomas Callandet, rector of St. Ann's church for instance, says:

"I have always heard that the word 'obey' in the marriage service simply implies that the wife acknowledges a loving recognition of the husband as head of the family. I therefore see no reason why the word 'obey' should be dropped out from the marriage service."

Mr. Callandet has evidently been a careful student of the "Pickwick Papers" and he knows that in a Pickwickian sense the word "obey" means a loving recognition. Very well, let us be grateful to our reverend friend for giving us a new definition to an old word, but will he kindly tell us whether the gospel which he preaches from his pulpit was born in the brain of a heavenly Pickwick and ought to be understood in a Pickwickian sense?

Another clergyman, the Rev. D. Parker Morgan, rector of the Church of Heavenly Rest, informs us that "there can be but one head of the family, and the gospel tells us that God has willed that the husband shall be 'the head of the wife, even as Christ is head of the church.'"

This settles the question. If it had pleased our Heavenly Father to make the husband the head of the wife, what right has the wife to complain? Surely God knows what is good for us, and no one but a hardened Infidel can question his goodness and wisdom.

Mr. Morgan continues: "The same authority would have women 'obedient to (i.e. obey) their husbands' (Titus ii, 5). Of course, it is presumed that the young women will marry sensible young men who would not ask, much less demand them to do anything but what is right."

How lovely! But suppose the young women make mistakes, as young women are liable to do, and marry young men who are not sensible and who demand something which is not right; suppose the young men have queer ideas of what is right and insist that the young women should submit to their sexual embraces no matter whether the latter have an inclination to do so or not—what then? Will Mr. Morgan say that women should be very careful in the selection of their husbands? If so, will he favor free and open discussion of sex matters and will he fight against the conspiracy of silence and the "movement in favor of ignorance?" Will he start a crusade against the Comstock law, and will he protest against the prosecution of men who are doing their best to impart knowledge which in marriage relations would help to avoid misery and to bring happiness?

But let us stop asking questions and listen again to Mr. Morgan. He says: "The submission or obedience of a wife to her husband as required by the church, is limited by the words 'in the Lord' (Colossians iii, 18). No one supposes for a moment that she is by her marriage vow pledging herself to submit to or obey her husband in anything that the Lord would not approve of."

This qualification makes the position of the wife still more intolerable. To be ruled by the husband is bad enough, but to be ruled by God is far worse. She may escape the tyranny of man, but how is she to escape the tyranny of God? She is not obliged to "obey her husband in anything that God would not approve of," but who is to decide the matter? Who knows what God does or does not approve? Shall the woman accept the Bible or the priest as the representative of God? It seems to me that the approval of God simply means the approval of the church, and so long as women believe in the church they will "obey" and hug their own chains. We need mental freedom; we need emancipation from the yoke of theology.

The Rev. George R. Van De Water, rector of St. Andrew's church, is greatly afraid that the omission of the word "obey" would result in the disappearance of women from the face of the earth. He says:

"I regard the objection to the word in the marriage service as needless, and in the line of much that nowadays would make woman unwomanly by making her seem manly."

What a great discovery! Just think of it! The little word "obey" helps to keep the world as it is, but let the word be dropped and all women will discard their long skirts, which so nicely protect their morals, smoke corn-cob pipes, drink whiskey, spit in the street cars and use profane language at every opportunity. If the word "obey" can save us from such a calamity, let it be retained by all means.

The Rev. B. F. DeCosta, rector of the Church of St. George the Martyr, thinks that to "obey" in the secular sense of the word is degrading, but "in sacramental union the word 'obey' has a different signification. . . . It is a pity that so many women fail to see the danger, mortification and disgrace of the servile, secular marriage that often takes the place of sacramental marriage." Put in plain English, Mr. DeCosta's language means this: Give the church more power, give her the right to control marriage and everything will be lovely—for the church. We are grateful to Mr. DeCosta for his kind suggestion, but we decline it "with thanks."

Lack of space prevents me from giving quotations from the letters of the other contributors to the "Herald's" symposium. I can only say that the burden of their song is that the husband is the head of the family and the wife must recognize him as such.

I know perfectly well that the marriage ceremony signifies nothing. I know that in spite of the woman's promise to "obey," the husband is not always the head of the family. Tyranny is not confined to men. Women are sometimes as cruel to their husbands as men are suppposed to be to their wives. A "henpecked" husband is as pitiful a sight as is an ill-treated woman. But theoretically, why should women be expected to obey men simply because they are men? The man who looks upon himself as the head of the house deserves very little admiration. The man who enslaves others is not free himself. To demand obedience is an insult against which all fair-minded persons should protest.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXVII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THE PROCUREMENT OF CAPITAL. There are two ways by which money can be procured for the association; by the sale of its stock, and by the issue of bonds. So far as the money is needed for the purchase of land, for the erection of buildings, or for permanent machinery to begin operations, it should be obtained by the sale of stock at par, to persons who can afford to make a permanent investment, with the assurance of equable compensation and of an equitable in the management to prevent its loss. The amount of the stock should be sufficient to purchase or construct all that is necessary to begin operations, free from debt.

The compensation should be a guarantee of the smallest annual dividend which will induce the investment, and of the redemption of the stock under specified conditions. A liberal representation of capital in the election of the council will conduce to increase the safety and desirability of the investment and so to diminish the annual dividend necessary to be paid upon the stock.

Lending a Hand

We gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following sums to sustain the publication of Lucifer—sent in response to the proposition of Henry W. Youmans and of others:

James Vincent Sr., $1; Dr. A. J. Clausen, $1.50; A Friend, Florida, $5.

VARIOUS VOICES.

L. A. Andrews, Liberal, Mo.—We are living in eventful times, a transition period, a passing out of the old into the new; I hope into more just, more equitable conditions for all. Out of the chaos of conflicting theories and opinions, after a while will come order and harmony, and the spirit of brotherhood and fraternity. The inclosed dollar is to apply on subscription to Lucifer.

O. M. M., Springfield, Mo:—In a recent article in Lucifer, Mrs. A. L. Washburn gives a quotation in which the following language appears: "To have within such high and holy thoughts of sex that outward expressions of sexual impurity in word or deed will no longer be a possibility." I would like to know definitely what she had in mind as "outward expressions of sexual impurity."

[Will Mrs. Washburn give us her view of this matter?

M. H].

"Fair Play," Philadelphia, Pa.—I want to call your attention to this ad. clipped from the "Press," of this city:

YOUNG LADY. EXP. FACIAL MASSAGE. To take part manicure parlors. M., 100, Press Office.

Every one knows what is meant by "facial massage"—at least every one hereabouts, for the daily papers, especially the Sunday papers are full of advertisements of "Massage Parlors" and "Manicure"—euphemistic names for houses of prostitution. Yet the papers that print these ads. execrate such papers as Lucifer.

Samuel Joy, Rockingham Junction, N. H.—Very sorry to learn of your ill-health. The question arises with me, what should we do if you should leave us? Then again, it is best to hope for the best and not borrow trouble. With all my reform papers yours takes the widest range for every good word and work. I have had the Chicago martyrs in gilded frame several years hanging in the sitting room, and the reasons why they are there, in another frame by the side of them, by distinguished authors. Pleased to learn their graves were decorated the 11th. Please send me the paper containing report of the meeting. Stamps enclosed.

F. Varden, Winneba, Gold Coast, West Africa.—Having come across a copy of your quarterly paper "Our New Humanity," which I admire, I take the liberty of enquiring whether you have a spare copy of the April 1897 number (or of any other, in fact,) of that paper, and if so at what price you sell those back numbers.

[We have been obliged by hard times, to suspend the publication of "Our New Humanity" but have a fair supply of back numbers of all issues except the first, which we continue to send post paid to all applicants at twenty-five cents per number. British Colonial postage stamps will be accepted in payment, where other currency is not obtainable. M. H.]

"M.," Florida.—I am "neither poor nor rich," but I manage out of faithful labor to keep enough put by for bread and butter, birth (not death) and burial. The enclosed $5 I have extracted from the little pile for Moses Harman. I know I am doing right, because all the B's seemed to set up a merry happy buzz when I took it.

The book containing his picture came two days ago; as I looked upon it I felt I faced a sacred presence; my eyes filled at thoughts of his martyrdom for dear truth's sake. I have traveled the rough, thorny road with crushed heart and bleeding feet, yet I know of nothing that pays bigger per cent on the investment than an earnest seeking for, and living what we deem is truth. We may have to journey over the desolate moorlands alone, or stand upon the stormy headlands of life in solitude, but, my dear, it pays. The few pearls of truth that we can grasp, the glorious sense of freedom, the purpose for high and noble living, are more than worth the crumbling creeds we have left behind.

I am so sorry for your father's sickness—I trust you will keep well—I send in separate package a soft, pretty wool shawl for your own shoulders, as you are up with him nights. It has been wrought in love to the very finger tips; I hope you will enjoy it as much as I have. Yours for all that is grand and brave and true.

A. P. M.—"Submit—'tis the will of God"—What a terrible work these words have performed. Submit is the password of God's people—the poor, given them by self-constituted directors, rulers. Can a people submissive to rapacity, injustice and tyranny ever evolve into a great nation? We became a nation by not submitting; we decline, we decay, in all that is best by doing so.

The erudite St. Paul said, "Servants, submit yourselves to your masters. Wives, submit yourselves to your husbands." Not Christ, but Paul said it. Paul is the most popular saint in the fashionable churches today and oftenest quoted. The fisherman type of saint is not so pleasing to our fat, prosperous clergy. How the profession would be weeded out if the clergy had to "submit" once and for all to the rule, "Without scrip or staff in your hands—working your way for Christ's sake."

Will our people never learn that God is not a far-off deity, sitting in solemn splendor above the clouds in stoical indifference to human woe until roused by supplication? The spirit or essence of good is right here, all around us everywhere in nature—the beginning of all life, truth and beauty—in every one of these who represent Christ in their sufferings.

Those of us who know and understand should teach how to bring his kingdom on earth, by discarding the old submissive cant, "Your reward shall be in Heaven."

W. B., Burlington, Iowa.—Please send me some extra copies of Lucifer of the memorial edition for the enclosed twenty-five cents.

I take this opportunity of referring to you a few questions which my wife has been asking me and which I have been unable to answer. Those "Hygienic Rules of Living," published in your No. 735, advise her to rest before and after each meal. Before the meal, does that mean before the cooking of it? And after the meal, does that mean before or after washing the the dishes? The person who wrote that ought to have been more particular. My wife also wants to know where she is to go to when advised to "be sure and get clear away for at least a month every year" and who is going to pay for it? A little too much of that "port wine and seashore advice" or like a certain railway president's wife of our acquaintance who advised the ailing wife of one of the railroad employes to "go East for the summer!" If you can throw any light upon the above doubtful topics, please let it shine for yours truly.

[The author of the "Hygienic Rules of Living," referred to by "W. B.," is Mrs. Elma Stuart, of Wokingham, England. Whether she will care to answer the questions of our correspondent, or not, we do not know: Meantime Lucifer's readers are invited to send short answers, on this very important topic to our "Voices" column.]

Charles Dutton, Durrant, Iowa.—Herewith find stamps (or coins) to the amount of twenty-five cents. It belongs to the banker, and by acting in concert they can withdraw it from circulation and create a money panic—hence I've no money of my own, or would send you a dollar that my neighbor might read and learn why such a large class (the farmers and the wage-workers) never have money of their own, hence grow up in ignorance of not only the laws of nature, but of their political, religious and constitutional rights.

Lucifer's corps of correspondents, including its scribes, are the best posted, no doubt, upon the various phases of the reform movement, of any publication in America; but when it comes to apply a remedy for the abolition of the privileged classes very many of them either do not understand what they are trying to explain to your readers, or they are talking through their hats.

Nearly all of them, including yourself, understand that the prevailing opinions entertained by society at the birth of the next generation, affected their parents even before birth, making them like clay in the hands of the potter to be moulded by the political bosses, to vote for a legion of officials who are of no use whatever, except to draw their salaries. And "when knaves and fools get up a fight to settle their disputes the working men will rush pell mell and play the human brutes."

> "Disgusted with the rule of kings,
> And with their cringing tools;
> I came to free America, where boasting freemen rules,
> Where Yankee doodles fit and bled to free themselves from kings
> I found their degenerate sons were ruled by thieves and rings."

Now all who are posted regarding the laws which make or create money, know that it is impossible to organize or build up a ring trust, monopoly or combine of any kind without first securing a monopoly of money or credit by law. The terms credit and money are synonymous, or mean the same thing. But another class of Lucifer's correspondence who alluded to money as being capital. A more delusive idea never entered mind of man.

Another phase of reform is co-operation; but since all attempts of the kind have failed for want of a co-operative currency or money, it seems they are not posted on the subject of reformation. Still another class of writers want the laws relating to marriage and the giving in marriage abolished to usher in the milennium. Well, I admit marriage laws should be abolished, but under existing conditions the American people are more likely to be struck by lightning than to carry such legislation through congress or state assembly.

[Yes, it is quite true that there is little prospect of reform in, or abolition of, marriage laws through additional legislation. Reform does not usually come in this way. Our hope is not that law-makers will ever undo the evil they have done, but rather that enlightened public sentiment will ignore marriage laws, customs and ideas in regard to the right use and the abuse of the sex function and the normal relations of the sexes thereby relegating these man-made laws to the category of rudimentary or vestigiary social forms. Peaceful not violent, be their death, and for them let there be no resurrection. As to "co-operation," much more depends upon right education and right living, in the social (including sexual) relations than upon any possible reform in "currency" laws, although the mischief done by the money of "privilege" is great beyond the power of tongue or pen to tell.]

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," R. G. Ingersoll, p. 5.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 288 pages. Price, 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or disgruntled religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in a compact form. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

"Loma" "A CITIZEN OF VENUS," by Prof. Wm Windsor. A story of surpassing interest, largely devoted to Sexologic and Sociologic problems. Like Bellamy in his "Looking Backward," the writer of "Loma" believes in the "state," as a factor in social evolution, but individualists will probably forgive this feature for the sake of the radically revolutionary ideas in regard to popular theories—sexologic, theologic, cosmologic, etc. Substantially printed and artistically bound. PERSONAL A well-educated, broad minded, liberal lady, neat in person, well preserved, not far from seventy years young—alone in the world, living in an orthodox village, wishes to correspond with single gentlemen, healthy, liberal, of excellent habits, neither poor nor rich, of about the same age. The years do not make us old so much as our thoughts. With good, clean habits and sound heredity the limit of life should not be under 85 or 90. Willing to go to any of Uncle Sam's new possessions to begin life and grow up with the country. All first letters may be directed to "M," care of Lucifer.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

PERSONAL An honorable radical gentleman between 30 and 40 years of age, who is well educated and a total abstainer from the use of intoxicating liquor and tobacco, would like to make the acquaintance of a radical middle-aged lady who would like to come East and do very light housekeeping for a home this fall and part or whole of winter. I will pay railroad fare if necessary. Address H, care Lucifer.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 25 cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. II., No. 48. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, DECEMBER 3, E. M. 298. [C. E. 1898.] WHOLE No. 739.

It Takes Strength.

It takes great strength to train
To modern service your ancestral brain;
To lift the weight of the unnumbered years
Of dead men's habits, methods and ideas;
To hold that back with one hand, and support
With the other the weak steps of a new thought.

It takes great strength to bring your life up square
With your accepted thought and hold it there;
Resisting the inertia that drags back
From new attempts to the old habit's track.
It is easy to drift back, to sink;
So hard to live abreast of what you think!

It takes great strength to live where you belong
When other people think that you are wrong;
People you love, and who love you, and whose Approval is a pleasure you would choose.
To bear this pressu length
In living your belief—well it takes strength.
And courage, too.

An Emotional Sex.

BY DORA F. KERR.

It has been remarked that comparatively few women express themselves in writing on the modern aspect of the sex question. If this be so, perhaps it is that many of us are glad to find many men at last beginning to exercise their reason on a matter of such importance to the human race, that we are thankful rather to watch their efforts than to take much active part in them; like one who, after many weary endeavors to persuade a child to learn the alphabet, at last restfully enjoys seeing it able to read a book by itself.

While I rejoice in the patience and ability with which our Lillian sets forth common sense on the sex question, my experience of the ordinary in advanced man, and his lack of observation, of reason, and of fairness, in attempts to discuss any portion, of "the woman question," inclines me to leave men to think out the simplest problems for themselves until they are able to co-operate with women in solving the more difficult problems.

I should like, however, to challenge an assertion made in a recent Lucifer, and frequently elsewhere, which seems to me to contradict facts which have some important bearing on our subject. This assertion is that women are more impulsive, or more emotional than men. I believe this idea arises, like many others, from the unconscious alteration in standards which is so common when making comparisons between the sexes, and perhaps it is strengthened in the minds of many men by experiences resulting from their preferring to associate with women of the more impulsive type, and at the most impulsive age, or with those who have not had the training and experience which corrects hastiness. But who that has had the ruling of boys and girls does not know that girls are more docile? Is it in boys' or girls' schools that impulse leads most frequently to quarrels and fights? Who has not found women teachers more patient than men? Who does not know households in which recurrent domestic thunder storms take their rise in the mind of the male head of the family, to soothe whom is one important function of the matron? Does not the word virago imply a woman so extraordinarily impulsive as to storm and rage like an angry man?

The same tendency to calmness in women is noticeable in our women authors, who shine rather in clear logical writing and power of close analysis, than in vivacity and dramatic brilliance. Of this, "George Eliot" and Mrs. Humphrey Ward, are examples.

The conclusions of scientific investigators of differences in sex bear the same testimony, as well as the most ordinary observations on animals lower than man. Geddes and Thompson ("Evolution of Sex") describe female life as more "vegetative." "One only exception must be made; female impulsiveness when young offspring are endangered cannot be surpassed by male impulsiveness; the fierce anger of the wild cow defending her newly-born calf is a sufficient protection against even the lion. But on ordinary occasions who would not rather trust a cow than a bull to be less impulsive? a sow than a boar? a ewe than a ram?"

I venture to add my opinion that a less inflammable temper and more equable emotions are conducive to a stronger habit of reason; and I believe it to be to the calm judgment and clear common sense of women that we may look for social reform. That "evil is wrought by want of thought more than by want of heart" is shown every day. Unhappy marriage partnerships are oftener caused by men whose inconsiderate emotional impulses urge them on, than by women who coolly—too coolly—take up marriage as the only lucrative profession left open to them, and some of the cruellest social ills are caused by men whose impulse makes them pursue a girl for a time with the greatest ardor and then throw aside her companionship for that of another human toy.

In the writings of our men reformers, emotion is very noticeable. They remind one of the Irishman who is said to love fighting for fighting's sake. The contributions of women, while briefer and perhaps more prosaic, are more useful because they consist chiefly of statements of concrete facts.

Who Protects the Wife?

BY LOIS WAISBROOKER.

In Lucifer, No. 736 I find a letter that shows more contempt for womanhood than anything I ever read elsewhere. The editor has commented well, but I want to say a few words also:

The writer does not understand either the new woman or the Anarchist. The new woman demands willing relations or none, and she also demands the knowledge that will enable her to regulate maternity. Women who are normal and who have been rightly treated, are not as a rule, so much less passional as men. It is this making of women the property of man, this binding of her person to his use whether she desires him or not, I mean legal marriage, it is this that has taken the life out of woman and made her the irresponsive being she now, so often is. I say life, for normal sex desire is life if rightly used.

Mr. Vogeler says: "Remove all governmental restraint and let woman as a whole submit to the desires of men only when they wish to become mothers." I know of no class of women outside of those who have been ruined by the "arbitrary conditions" of married life—these and a few religious fanatics, who propose any such thing. And with freedom for woman and the conditions of society made conformable to such freedom, the man who could not find reciprocity would be so ashamed of it that he would be very careful not to let the world know it by any overt act on his part.

"The woman may struggle but blows will subdue her—and no government to protect her frail person."

Bah! where is the protection for the frail person of the wife? Do overnment enforce the man's claims? The writer would be ashamed of the brutal picture he paints and calls it man, had he any idea of woman's nature and of the satisfying effect of mutuality as compared with forced relations. Association without mutuality soon destroys the woman's power to reciprocate while to the man it is like drinking salt water to quench thirst.

Mr. Vogeler says of the mother of twenty-four children: "To this woman the man is not the brute it is fashionable now to picture him," yet he himself makes man more of a brute than does any woman I ever heard talk. Listen:

"But the economically free and independent woman who is absolutely free sexually must remain an iridescent dream so long as man retains his present sexual nature unchanged, and woman is the frail being that nature has made her, who cannot exist in a civilized community, make a living and raise children without the co-operation of some one else. And let woman be able to do all this alone, yet her very love of ease and repugnance to doing battle with the world will prompt her to put herself in the power of some man who is willing to assist her in return for favors she may be able to grant . . . . . To me, woman seems to be making a mistake in trying to deprive herself of the advantages she has gained by centuries of diplomacy and cunning."

The whole letter shows only contempt for women, but in this last quotation there seems to be a concentrated brutality which I have no words to illustrate. Woman must take what man is determined she shall have, even if he has to use force, at her own cost, must be responsible for all the consequences unless she puts herself "in the power of someman."

There is an implied declaration that man will do nothing for woman, nor for the children unless their mother is in his power, his property. No manhood there; no recognition of womanhood; she is simply a thing to minister to his pleasure, and at her own cost, the cost of her selfhood. And yet this man couples that state of things in which he says that woman is likely to lose what "her cunning and diplomacy have won her," with Anarchy. As ignorant here as elsewhere.

If all men were Anarchists no woman would ever be intruded upon. Anarchists believe in freedom, believe in the right to rule one's self but not to rule others. Anarchists and freelovers, is they are really such, are men of sense. They recognize mutuality as the only sanction for sex association. They do not consider that a woman has put herself in a man's power because she favors, or has once favored him, and they never consider what they do for the woman they love as the price of her person, but as another favor, for they are happy in doing for her.

One more point: This increasing revolt of intelligent womanhood against motherhood has a language that it would be well for men who deplore it to understand. It is an intuitive revolt against the present system of things, and the language is: We are tired of bearing children the half of which do not reach maturity—tired of seeing our sons shot down like dogs to maintain national honor—the duellist's code of honor on a national scale—tired of seeing our daughters become the victims of man's ignorance and passion till their diseased bodies are carted to dishon-red graves—i red of bearing children under conditions that they must fill asylums and prisons because the elements of weakness and crime were born with them. This is the language, and woman is not going to turn back; she is going to the front to lead men out of this system of brute force up to where love is the ruling power.

Labor Martyrs Remembered.

[Concluded from last week].

A great deal of what we call government is really nothing more than arrogance and impertinence," says Thomas Paine. "The higher the civilization the less cause for government, because civilized men govern themselves. All the laws society needs are laws of nature, to obey which no one needs government. We obey them because they are in our interest. The business of governing has been monopolized since the dawn of mankind by the most ignorant and worst of the human race."

Must it be so, friends? Do you believe that all those who govern us, who oppress us and betray us, were ordained to do so by right of birth? Do you believe that Judge Gary who condemned our comrades to death, that Governor Ogiesby who delivered them over to the hangman, would have been the same if they had been born and educated under other conditions? Certainly not. Every man is the product of his environment and conditions. An economically rotten state of society can produce only miserable, decayed members. The individual is only a mirror in which reappear all the virtues and vices of society.

If it is now certain that mankind is formed according to the existing economic conditions it will easily be understood that in a society which has ample room for the existence of every one, most of the evils from which we suffer will disappear.

I had the pleasure a little while ago to learn of a small town situated far away from the great highways in Wisconsin. In this hamlet they knew nothing about police and courts. No prison to be found, no petty larceny records in the columns of the local paper which gave the citizens the daily news. In answer to my questions in regard to all these blessings of the modern city life, I was informed that only once in a lifetime a petty larceny was recorded, and each time it was found that the thief was a stranger. Disputes were always settled among the inhabitants, and if they did not have to elect a council occasionally and pay taxes they would hardly know they lived under the laws of the state of Wisconsin. This small population lives apparently in perfect harmony. In answer to many inquiries as to how non-church members agreed with the members of the different churches I was told that disputes were very rare. One leaves the other alone, no one disturbs the other so long as each treats his neighbor in the same way. I was astonished to find during my stay in the place that everything I had heard was true. Do you believe now, my friends, that these people are better men than we who raise a dispute at every opportunity?

Certainly not. As I found out later on, all the inhabitants are in comfortable circumstances. "We do not have any poor here," said my informant, "consequently we have no beggars and no thieves. There are not twenty families in the whole place who are without land of their own. With us each one has what he needs to live on, but there are also very few who have more than they need for a comfortable living." In this latter condition is to be found the key to the, I might say, idyllic state of society in this Wisconsin hamlet.

Let us remove the economic cancer of our time, give to each one the opportunity to go comfortably through life, and the necessity for all the thousand and one compulsory measures which we call state and municipal laws, will at once be gone.

Let us consider a moment the different edicts and laws, for whose framing and execution we have to waste so much energy, time and money. In the first place, we have innumerable laws, dealing with the raising of taxes. I assert that a good half of all the taxes squeezed out of the poor man are, first, for the payment of our enormous multitude of officers (mostly unnecessary), or, secondly, retained (stolen) by the collectors for personal or political party purposes. Then we have the monstrous ramification of the civil and criminal court apparatus, polyp-like, twisted round the neck of the poor man.

To say nothing of the gigantic frauds and mutual robberies which show up in the legal battles of the modern millionaire capitalists and which battles demand thousands of judges, lawyers and other court officials, we find that the holding of a session of court results exclusively in putting poor tenants on the street, punishing drunkards and thieves and keeping them in custody, and so on.

Look where we may, we shall always find that laws are only for the purpose of maintaining the inequalities and injustice caused by unequal property ownership. So-called good laws are generally made to modify or restrain power; bad laws are made to nullify entirely these alleged good laws.

Men economically free do not need any laws, or very few laws, to enable them to live in peace and order. Certainly so long as mankind live in communities more or less large, there will always be certain agreements and rules and regulations among them, which must be respected by every one living in the commonwealth. But this does not say that such regulations must be like our present compulsory laws. There are also unwritten laws, laws which are transmitted to us by tradition and which are obeyed by everybody—laws which not only apparently, but in reality, have the community as legislator, and consequently can only be made in the interest of the whole community.

Do you say, The laws of our present society were made by the whole community? The facts teach us differently. The law machinery is a monster, which cannot be understood by the common citizen. A mountain of regulations and orders, frequently contradicting each other, and of whose existence, even the poor man as a rule learns only through the club of a policeman, through the order of the sheriff or the summons of the constable.

How different would this be in a society of free and equal citizens. Before my eyes expands a new world,—a world, as it may have been foreseen and hoped for by our dear friends. In this ideal world there will be room for all that bear a human face. For the first time, perhaps, man will then be glad of his existence, and the words, "Love thy neighbor as thyself" will become practical truth.

Looking about us we find that all necessary conditions for such an ideal existence are given us by nature. Beautiful is this world and inexhaustible its resources. The industry of man has succeeded in securing everything needful for life's joy. Life's gladness may now be produced in superabundance in a very short time. Man the inventor of the steam-horse; man who has harnessed the lightning for his service and compelled the machine to work for him in a thousand different ways, this man must and shall finally make it possible that all those wonderful victories which originated through the work of all men, must become a benefit to all.

I do not know how far we are yet separated from this much desired epoch, but this I know that the age of true humanity can not stay away forever. I also know that all the great heroes, of which history tells us, have battled for this aim, that many of them suffered death, and that our heroes also, whose memory we celebrate today, became martyrs for it. And truly we may say, Not to be lamented are those, who had the courage to die for such ideals. Great and glorious they stand before my vision, and never-to-be-forgotten they have made themselves to us. Later, much later, the great masses will remember them and pay them the tribute offered them to day by all thinking men and by all freedom-loving people of the world.

A solo by Madame Huber closed this part of the exercises, then an impressive recitation by Madame Nellie Quinn followed, describing the last hours of the condemned, and how she rendered the last words of the martyrs on the gallows will not be forgotten by the audience:

"There will come a time when our silence will be more powerful than the voices you strangle to-day."—A. Spies.

"Hurrah for Anarchy."—George Engel.

"Hurrah for Anarchy! This is the happiest moment of my life!"—A Fischer.

"Let the voice of the people be heard! Oh——"—Albert H. Parsons.

"On the Altar of Truth" followed as a beautiful cantata by several hundred male voices and the "Marseillaise," sung by all standing, closed this very impressive celebration.

One Woman's Thought.

BY MYRA PEPPERS.

"I believe that absolute abstinence from sex relations is best for me, and not only for me, but for all who seek the highest power for good."—Extract from a recent letter.

I am quite willing to accord to the author of the above sentiment that honesty of purpose and purity of motive that he claims for himself, but as there are many who will agree that it may be best for some, yet not best for all, I beg to give to Lucifer's readers my reply to that portion of the letter.

I cannot agree with you that total abstinence from sex relations is conducive to the highest power for good. The light I have upon the subject teaches me that the sex act is the highest manifestation of human love, and as such, builds up our three-fold natures, magnetizing the physical, electrifying the mental and quickening the spiritual. That it falls short of this in the majority of instances does not disprove the fact that when rightly used such benefits are derived. It seems to me that this abstinence, like other self-sacrifice, grew out of the old teachings of religion in which it was thought we must give something to propitiate God. After the burnt offerings, the doves, etc., they began to make the sacrifice more personal—to scourge and flay the flesh, etc., any self-abasement to honor God. Now God and Good are one. Our power for good lies not in giving up any of our pleasures—to be happy is to be good. I place sex relations on the highest plane, the rational plane, as I would place any and all of our functions. Because we need to eat we need not be gluttonous; because we have voices we need not screech or howl, and because we have sex organs and desires we need not debase ourselves nor our fellow creatures, sexually. If there is disgrace or dishonor attached to those who, feeling the harmony between them that makes them akin, who feeling an equality of mentality, a blending of spirit forces, who feeling, in short, that divine vibration called love, and who in glance of eyes, in touch of hands and lips, are drawn closer and yet closer until at length in complete union they find rapture and joy and peace—if to this act is attached disgrace, then it is disgraceful for the rose to give forth its fragrance; if dishonor, then it is dishonorable for the dewdrop to glisten in the sunshine. And if our power for good is increased by cutting off the climax of pleasure, then equally logical would it be to cease gazing at the beauties of nature, to shut our ears to the song of birds, to stamp out the flowers that give forth perfume and, like the ascetics of old, don the sack-cloth, heap ashes on our heads and try to find God (good) by the route of torture and self-sacrifice.

I firmly believe in the joyousness of love, that we can accomplish more, know more, be more when influenced by love. Nor do I mean to say that the sex act is all of love, but I believe that in its mutuality, its purity, it increases our virtues—all the good that is in us—that it is creative in deed and in truth, and that to create other bodies is not its highest function, but to create better thoughts, give birth to nobler deeds—this is the divine mission of sex congress, the real, the ultimate, sex love.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

TO THE report of the Secular Union Convention, written by Florence Johnson, I will add the statement that Mrs. Johnson herself contributed largely to the interest of the meetings by means of her dramatic readings, with which she entertained us at almost every session. Mrs. Johnson is a master of her art, as well as a clear thinker and logical writer. She will accept engagements to lecture or give entertainments between Kansas and Ohio until the last of January. Address her 1394 Congress St., Chicago.

"Hear All Sides; Then Decide."

This is excellent advice; but we are as yet unable to follow it in the Bedborough case. We have the statement of the Free Press Defense Committee, and of Mr. Foote, as well as that of Havelock Ellis, and a miscellaneous assortment of denunciatory articles from various sources, but a very important side remains to be heard. From George Bedborough himself we have no explanation—or rather, only a few hurriedly written statements in personal letters. Because of insufficient data we do not feel qualified to decide, and therefore refrain from expressing editorial opinion.

We give considerable space to the opinions of others. We would republish the Committee's Manifesto but for the fact that it is too long. It is very bitter in its denunciation of Mr. Bedborough. It would seem that fairness would require that he be heard in his own defense—that his statement of the case should appear with that of his accusers. Or, if he refused to make an explanation, the Committee should have stated that he had been given the opportunity, but had declined it. Nothing of the sort, however, is intimated. The document is devoted to practically unqualified condemnation of Mr. Bedborough.

In my opinion, Mr. Chamberlain's summing up of the case is very well done. Even though a compromise is the result, excellent work has been done in the interests of free speech and free press, and in judging George Bedborough, it should not be forgotten that, whatever his prosecution may have cost his friends, to him the cost has been infinitely greater.

But until we have heard all sides, we cannot fairly decide.

The Bedborough Fizzle.

BY E. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

The Bedborough case has ended ingloriously. After much sputtering no blow has been struck. One party was afraid and the other did not dare. Hence a compromise. As Mr. Bedborough compromised so Scotland Yard compromised, and we know full well that Scotland Yard would never have made concessions had it not been compelled by the shamefulness of its own conduct and by dread of further exposure to the scorn of outraged public opinion. Arrogantly bloated, and with the whole power of the nation behind it, Scotland Yard is not in the habit of making such concessions, and that it has now done so is a triumph for freedom fully as valuable as if Mr. Bedborough had been either convicted or acquitted. Perhaps Scotland Yard has learned something.

It is not in my heart to censure Mr. Bedborough for shrinking from such an unequal contest. Many poor wretches under similar compulsion have pleaded guilty to charges of witchcraft when there was no witchcraft, just as Mr. Bedborough now pleads guilty to charges of obscenity when it is manifest there is no obscenity.

The outcome has proven that Sir Charles Hall, the judge, was merely a subservient tool of Scotland Yard. Prostituting the duty and integrity of his judicial station to accomplish the vile purposes of the lewd ruffians of the detective service he does just what Scotland Yard wants him to do, and carries out to the letter the compromise intended to save that abominable institution from further discredit.

Before a judge inspired by such a purpose, is it likely that a trial could have resulted otherwise than in conviction? If this judge was willing to do so much for Scotland Yard, would he not have done a little more and managed the trial so that conviction would surely ensue? We can discern clear indications of his disposition in the abusive remarks he addressed to the defendant.

Under these circumstances would anything have been gained for freedom of thought and expression by the martyrdom of Mr. Bedborough? I think not. It is demonstrated as clear as anything ever was demonstrated that there was no reason to expect fairness or honesty on the part of such a judge and no self-respecting citizen would ever have acquiesced in a conviction nor valued an acquittal in that forum. The moment the judge became a partisan of Scotland Yard that moment his moral power ceased.

Mr. Bedborough must have weighed all these considerations and doubtless accepted the compromise simply because he had no trust in the honesty of the court and no confidence that he could get a fair trial. His plea of guilty must be regarded therefore, as yielding to a superior force and not as an admission of any wrong doing. All the sham declamation of the judge and the prosecution on taking the plea of guilty deceives nobody. I do not question the imperative necessity of Mr. Bedborough's choice.

The compromise has left open one very suggestive point. On page 3 of the statement issued by the Free Press Defense Committee we read, "In reply to a pointed question, Mr. Digby stated (in Mr. Bedborough's presence) that the overture for a compromise came from the prosecution."

Mr. Matthews, prosecuting counsel, in his effort to whitewash Scotland Yard and make the best of a bad business, addressed the court in these words: "The defendant took a course of which I think your lordship will entirely approve, for he himself of his own action, without any invitation at all, went to the authorities at Scotland Yard, placed himself in communication with them, and to them he disclosed what he said was the actual position which he occupied in regard to this work. He did more than that. He asked the police of Scotland Yard to make inquiry for the purpose of satisfying those officers that what he told them was true, and that he had taken no principal part in this terrible traffic, but that his part was entirely subordinate," etc. (see verbatim report in "Reynolds' Newspaper," Nov. 6, 1898). There is a distinct contradiction between these two statements. Somebody has lied. Either Mr. Digby or Mr. Matthews is a liar. It is not easy to see how Mr. Digby could have any motive for falsifying, while the disgraceful necessities of Mr. Matthews' position leave little doubt that he thought a lie would help him out and justify his part in the compromise. Saying nothing of the improbability of Scotland Yard's needing more information after its detectives had gone through a course of attendance on the meetings of the Legitimation League and hobnobbing with its members, it is manifest that as Mr. Matthews was maintaining a lie as to the character of the publications in question he has no right to complain if we attribute mendacity to him concerning other matters.

One thing more. I learn from our English friends that Scotland Yard is a department of the Home Office of which Matthew

White Ridley is the official head. Mr. Ridley is responsible, therefore, for all this abominable business, and could have ended it summarily by a simple order, which an honest man would have hastened to make. Likewise had Mr. Ridley been an honest man he would long ago have ordered the release of Mrs. Maybrick. That he did neither fixes his character in the light in which it will be viewed by posterity. That he is devoted to the infamy he so richly merits furnishes no balsam for Mrs. Maybrick, for whose pathetic misfortune I have the most sincere sympathy; nor does it recompense Mr. Bedborough for his sufferings at the hands of Mr. Ridley's licentious underlings, but Mr. Ridley's relations to these two conspicuous judicial outrages will for a long time henceforth be cited as emphasizing the urgent need of free expression and honest teaching in official as well as in private life along the lines upon which Mr. Bedborough was working.

The Secular Union Convention.

The Annual Convention of the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation held in this city on November 18, 19 and 20, was a successful meeting. The attendance was fair in point of numbers, taken as an average of several years, but Chicago people, who compared it with the attendance of two years ago, thought it small. They forget that it was then considered a phenomenal meeting, and those present declared it the "largest reform meeting ever held." Besides our United States speakers at that time, we had the benefit of the presence of our English co-workers Foote and Watts, and everything tending to draw numbers was at our service. The death of our noble leader and president, Samuel P. Putnam, was a loss from which we have not yet recovered. "The Cleveland panic and McKinley boom" have impoverished the laboring portion of humanity until the wonder is the meeting was as well attended as it was.

The time Friday was occupied largely by appointing committees and discussion on the best means of freethought propaganda, addresses on that subject being given by M. Florence Johnson, W. F. Jamieson and C. Elton Blanchard. Letters from absent friends were read. Professor James A. Greenhill gave an interesting astronomical address and the Hon. C. T. Palmer lectured on "Representation without Taxation." He satirically complimented the Freethinkers on reaching a development where they needed no God; he let us know that the "God of the forest" is his favorite deity. His address showing the representative power of the church with its millions of untaxed property—property not used for religious purposes—was true and forcible, and right in line with the "Nine Demands of Liberalism." It was one of the important speeches of the Congress.

Saturday afternoon an address was expected from our veteran worker, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, but owing to her illness we were deprived of her helpful utterances.

Saturday there were reports of committees and election of officers as well as the speeches of our workers.

The following officers were re-elected: John E. Remsburg, president; E. C. Reichwald, secretary; Otto Wettstein, treasurer.

President Remsburg made an appeal to the delegates present for money to make it possible to do the work waiting to be done, and the response was a generous contribution, not one dollar of which is supposed to come from a washerwoman, nor to take the necessaries of life from the family of the contributors.

The address by Rev. C. F. Elliott "A Working Substitute for Religion" was good.

Mrs. Freeman was interesting, instructing and entertaining as usual.

Clarence S. Darrow spoke on Walt Whitman, giving an insight into his character and writings. The address was unique and would well repay one for a long trip to attend the congress had it been the only speech delivered.

Sunday we were treated to the utterances of Mrs. Georgia Cooly, Judge C. B. Waite on "Origin, Growth and Decay of Religion;" W. F. Jamieson, "Why Liberalism Languishes and Superstition Thrives;" Otto Wettstein on "Cosmic Problem Simplified," and short addresses by President Remsburg and Vice-President Mrs. M. A. Freeman.

A. E. Gammage also did some effective work for the Chicago Secular Union, of which he is president.

Resolutions regarding the encroachments of the theocratic legislation and our determination to continue the fight for religious freedom were read and adopted.

There were music and recitations at the different sessions, which added to the social feature of the meetings.

That the Congress was a success and points to much more effective work in the future, is attested by the donations coming much more freely than for some time.

The American Secular Union and Freethought Federation is alive and flourishing, and if each of the delegates puts into practice as nearly as possible his theory of aggressive propaganda, the result must be a material increase in Secular freedom and a decided decrease in church usurpation and that very soon.

M. FLORENCE JOHNSON.

The Breakdown of the Fight for Free Press.

BY E. C. WALKER.

Without the least intention or desire to add to the burdens and sorrows of George Bedborough, and disclaiming any wish to harshly criticise his action in the premises, it is necessary to say that the outcome is regrettable in every way. As Mr. George W. Foote most justly says, the man who hereafter "fights to a finish will be placed at a serious disadvantage." And Mr. Foote has earned his right to his mild criticism, for he has fought "to a finish," he has served his year in an English prison; and he has stood staunchly for free press, for the right of others who disagree with him, in this battle so disastrously closed. So far as my reading informs me, this is the first collapse in the defensive struggle so long maintained by English radicals, and I cannot conceal my sorrow that it has remained for Social Radicals to do what mere Freethinkers in England have not done. Of course I do not forget the attitude of Charles Watts at the beginning of the Bradlaugh-Besant fight over the right of publication of the "Fruits of Philosophy," an attitude which cost him his position under Charles Bradlaugh, but I also remember that he was not the one attacked by the government, and that those who were attacked fought sturdily for years and tore victory from the jaws of seemingly certain defeat.

Concerning the effect of this surrender upon the freedom of press in England, I need add nothing to the calm statement of Mr. Foote, whose summing up I subjoin. I assume that you will gladly print it, for Mr. Foote was one of the prominent and one of the hard-working members of the Free Press Defense Committee, and that Committee should be heard, officially or semi-officially.

"THE COLLAPSE OF THE BEDBOROUGH CASE.

"The Bedborough case has ended in a perfect collapse. Without any sort of consultation with the Free Press Defense Committee, which had done all the agitation and raised a considerable sum of money, that has gone to no purpose into the pockets of the solicitor and other legal gentlemen, Mr. Bedborough made a compromise with the prosecution, under which he pleaded guilty to the first three counts in the indictment, which included Dr. Havelock Ellis's book, and was let off lightly, being, in fact, only bound over to come up for judgment if called upon. He gave an undertaking not to meddle with such things again, and for all public purposes we suppose it may be said, 'Exit Mr. Bedborough.'

"We do not feel disposed to denounce Mr. Bedborough. It is really no use throwing stones at a man who is five feet six high because he is not six feet two. Heroes are born, not made; they cannot be manufactured even by influential committees. Mr. Bedborough quailed at the near prospect of imprisonment, and doubtless a great many other persons would do the same if they were tested. Moreover, he had lost his employment, and had been obliged to break up his home and live upon his furniture. Nor can we help saying that he was very unfairly treated. He did sell two copies of Dr. Havelock Ellis's book to two detectives—quite above board; but he was not the publisher. The author and the printer, whose names were on the book, were not molested. He alone was singled out to bear the whole brunt of the attack, and, although he spoke very bravely, his strength was not equal to the battle.

"Without indulging in vain denunciation, however, we are bound to express our profound regret at the unfortunate end of this prosecution. Had it been foreseen, there would have been no Free Press Committee, no appeal to the public, and no collections of funds. All the efforts made on behalf of free discussion have been rendered abortive; and should another struggle occur, the man who fights to a finish will be placed at a very serious disadvantage.

The Free Press Defense Committee, on learning Mr. Bedborough's arrangement with the prosecution, had no alternative but to dissociate itself from the case, and refuse to pay another penny to the solicitor, who, in our judgment had received too much already. This was done before the case was heard at the Old Bailey. Another meeting will be held after we go to press, and no doubt a manifesto will be issued to the public with the least possible delay. The Secular party has been more than adequately represented in the circumstances, and that at least is one subject of congratulation."—London Freethinker.

A Compromise.

It is well to fight and win—
If that may be;
It is well to fight and die therein—
For such go free.

It is ill to fight and find no grave
But a prison cell:
To keep alive, yet live a slave—
Praise those who fell.

But worst of all are those who stand
With arms laid by,
Bannerless, helpless, no command,
No battle cry.

They live to save unvalued breath
With lowered eyes:
In place of victory, or death,
A compromise.

—Charlotte Perkins Stetson.

The supporters of Bedborough are disappointed at his back-down, but I, who know what prison life is even at its best, have no word of condemnation for anybody who escapes it, by whatever means, especially when the prospect is that of the infamous British prison. Who knows, besides, but that the British government, had not so many prominent men sprung to Bedborough's defense and had not three hundred and seventy pounds sterling been raised and spent, would have been able to secure a jury to convict him and would have refused to liberate him on his own recognizance. Of course freedom has received no sort of encouragement, and Bedborough's hands are probably tied, but there are still others. And I am not one of the persons who insist upon anybody's going to prison to defend freedom. Are all of those who rail at Bedborough's action ready to serve the sentence that he might have received?—C. L. Swartz in "I."

Beautiful Sea Shells.

Every one admires them. Since coming to Florida I have received numerous inquiries for sea shells, and now I am prepared to answer yes I can send you shells, for I have made quite a collection of lovely shells both from our own coast, the coral reefs, and some beautiful ones from the West India Islands. I will mail a dozen or more different kinds, no two alike to any one who sends a stamp for postage.

MRS. F. A. WARNER, Jacksonville, Fla.

We, Who "Live in Glass Houses."

From "Ideala."

"And where have you come from, Ideala?" was the first question.

"From China," she answered.

There was a general exclamation.

"I have been with the missionaries in China," she added.

"Oh, isn't it very strange, the life in China?" some one asked.

"It looks different," she said, "but it feels like our own. To begin with, one is struck by the strange appearance of the people, and the quaint humor of their art; but when the first effect wears off, and you learn to know them, you find, after all, that theirs is the same human nature, only in another garb; the familiar old tune, as it were, with a new set of variations. The like and unlikeness is common enough, but still the finding of a remarkable similarity in this apparently unlike continues to surprise us."

"But Ideala, you cannot compare the Chinese to ourselves. Think of the state of degradation the people are in! Every crime is rife among them—infanticide is quite common."

"Yes," said Ideala, as if it were the most natural thing in the world. "Yes, doubtless, the lower classes in China kill their children; here, in certain districts, their insure them," Ideala concluded gravely.

"But then," said Claudia—"Oh! Ideala, I don't think you can establish a parallel We all know the sort of a life a Chinese lady leads."

"When a lady is not at the head of her house it is certainly vacuous," Ideala agreed, "like the lives of our own ladies, when they are not forced to do anything. Why, at Scarborough this year they had to take to changing their dresses four times a day; so you can imagine how they languish for want of occupation."

"Well, at all events, English girls are not sold into a hateful form of slavery," some one observed contentedly.

"Are you not?" Ideala rejoined, with a flash. "I can assure you that both women and men, fathers, husbands and brothers, of the same class in England, do sell their young girls—and I can prove it."

"We have the pull over them in the matter or marriage, then. We don't give our daughters away against their will, as they do."

"That is not a fair way of putting it. A Chinese girl expects to be so disposed of, and accepts the arrangement as a matter of course. And the system has its advantages. The girl has no illusions to be shattered, she expects no new happiness in her married life; so that any that comes to her is clear gain. As to our daughters' inclinations not being forced, I suppose they are not exactly. But have you never been conscious of the tender pressure that is brought to bear when a desirable suitor offers? Have you ever seen a girl that won't marry when she is wanted to, wincing from covert stabs, mourning over cold looks, and made to feel outside everything—suffering a small martyrdom under the general displeasure of all for whom she cares, her world, without whose love life is a burden to her, whom she believes to know best about everything? As Mrs. Bread said about Madame de Cintre: 'She is a delicate creature, and they may make her feel wicked'—and she ends by thinking any sacrifice light at the moment, if only it wins her back the affection and esteem of her friends."

Ideala had been carried away with her earnestness, and now she stopped abruptly, somewhat disconcerted to find every one listening to her. The ladies sat with their eyes on the floor, the gentlemen exchanged glances, but no one spoke for some time.

At last my sister made a move, and the spell was broken. We separated for the night, and many were the lady-like whispers that reached my ears, all ending in "So like Ideala!"

But, as Ideala herself remarked on another occasion: "You can't sweep a room that requires it without raising a dust; the thing is to let the dust settle again, and then remove it.

James G. Clark's Poems.

W. R. HAVENS, 830 Bellevue Ave. Los Angeles, Cal.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Georgia Replogle, Denver, Colo.—Fielden was here for the memorial meeting for the Chicago men. I like him personally. His simplicity is almost childlike. He has the steadiest, most honest pair of eyes I ever looked into; you know it is so seldom that anyone will look unhesitatingly into your eyes. He is not so advanced as some, but he has an earnestness about him that is restful. I met him twice at informal meetings besides the public ones.

I met Albina L. Washburn the other day. She is a pleasant faced white-haired, short, round rolly-polly sort of a woman, most enthusiastic for co-operation.

To those who know —— —— well it is quite useless for her to use a "fraud name," as Forrest calls it. It would be a joke on me if "Giotto" was not ——, but I'll risk my reputation for guessing on it.

C. M. H., Chicago.—Is not our cause progressing when members of the bar talk in this strain? Hear one of them on the divorce question in a private letter:

"Occasionally I hear some long-haired man advocating more stringent divorce laws. They make me sick. How little they know of human life. . . Aside from the personal torment which comes from the indissoluble marriage that should never have occurred, comes a long train of crimes, heartaches and misery which exceed human comprehension and are infinite in their consequences. . . . Thousands of domestic tragedies have been narrated to me—thousands of bleeding hearts exposed. Calvaries are everywhere, and nails and spears draw guiltless blood. A thousand times I have asked myself, 'Is it consistent with Infinite Justice that one should suffer life imprisonment or punishment for the commission of an innocent mistake? As surely as the light must follow the darkness, the time is coming, is almost here, when common sense and human development will sanction by universal approbation more laxity in divorce laws. So far as we know we have but one life to live, and justice should not require that it be lived in bondage, in mental and physical incarceration, in a matrimonial penitentiary. . . . I have traced domestic tragedies to this common source till I have almost screamed with the oppressive sense of its awful injustice and every detail seems burned into my brain. . .

"This social deformity, this life-destroyer that modern society has created, has warped and dwarfed and deformed innumerable lives. It has become a gibbet on which are torn and bruised and lacerated some of the fairest and noblest lives this world has ever known. Into the cavernous maw of this social monster have gone the peace, the happiness, the hope of millions of men and women. . . I must close, for the very thought of the writing what could and should be done in this matter simply appalls me."

Alice Beresford.—May I say a few words from one woman's little hill of observation and experience? It might be better, physically, for women to gratify their sex natures, believing it to be wrong so to do, but it would not be generally beneficial—it would not develop the mental and moral nature. When women who are religious take the control of their sexual conduct into their own hands, doing so in opposition to their religious belief, I believe a large majority of them throw away that part of their religious creed. I think that the reason the race is not lower than it is, is because when a woman loves she knows that love is right and beautiful and beneficent. She may not have the courage to admit it in words, but when a woman loves she feels that it is the noblest part of life she has ever known or imagined. In comparison, creeds and laws are cold and cruel and wrong when they presume to forbid love. I was trained in strict orthodoxy; I believed all I was taught regarding the chastity of woman, but when my sex nature awoke my brain also awoke, and not all the ministers and lawyers in the United States could have made me believe I had "sinned," and if I had been the only one such a defiance would have affected, I think that in the impetuosity of youth I should have challenged the world. I want to say that it is better to have the theory precede the practice, for not every girl has the brain that will lift her onto the heights of untroubled thoughts and noble purpose after she has disobeyed the decrees of society But there are thousands of women whose change of theory and feeling is simultaneous. Their thought and action harmonize so far as such harmony is possible as society stands today.

Charles Gano Baylor, Providence, R. I.—One of the inexplicable phenomena of human history is the governing power of an aristocracy—of the few over the many. At the South before the war, the overseer on a plantation always called on the other slaves to bring and bind the one which was to receive the lash. The slaves submissively obeyed the overseer and would strip their fellow slave, tie his hands and then tie him to the whipping post. At the North today, it is only necessary for the capitalistic master to order one white wage slave to murder another in the name of law, and the miserable wretch is as obedient as the negro chattel slave of the South ever was. In England two thousand titled families govern 40,000,000 Englishmen. In Germany less than fifteen hundred aristocratic families govern 38,000,000 Germans. These English and German aristocratic-governed slaves, claim to be the most liberty-loving, self-respecting and civilized people of the world. Before the American Civil War between the New England federal and the Southern slave lords for power (for that is what that war was waged for) less than five hundred slave-holding, aristocratic families of the South governed the entire United States—governed them and ruled them absolutely with an iron rod—the war transferred the governing power of the United States from the slave lords of the South to the Federal Imperialists and tariff thieves of New England. And now, less than five hundred traditional millionaire families of these once pauper states govern the whole country and practically own it, besides one-half of Mexico, where a mere handful of the governing class play the same extraordinary game.

Will some reader of Lucifer explain this? As all human action pivots on the supreme motive for individual action and exertion, and as woman (her possession) from Helen of Troy down, is the priceless privilege which all men under the present so-called civilization seek to enjoy exclusively, is not sex-vassalage, and legalized concubinage under the marriage law, the secret hidden spring which enables the few to thus enslave the many?

America's Slaves.

Is this the land our fathers loved?
The freedom which they toiled to win?
Is this the soil whereon they moved?
Are these the graves they slumber in?
Are we the sons by whom are borne
The mantles which the dead have worn?

Of human skulls the shrine was made,
Round which the priests of Mexico
Before the loathsome idol prayed—
Is freedom's altar fashioned so?
And must we yield to freedom's God,
As offering mete, the worker's blood?

Shall tongues be mute when deeds are wrought
Which well might shame extremest hell?
Shall freedom lock the indignant thought?
Shall pity's bosom cease to swell?
Shall honor bleed?—shall truth succumb?
Shall pen, and press, and soul be dumb?

No! By each spot of haunted ground
Where freedom weeps her children's fall—
By Plymouth rock and Bunker's mound,
By Griswold's stained and shattered wall—
By Warren's ghost—by Langdon's shade—
By all the memories of our dead!

By their enlarging souls, which burst
The bands and fetters round them set—
By the free pilgrim spirit nursed
Within our inmost bosom, yet—
By all above—around—below—
Be ours the indignant answer—No!

Thomas Paine on Love and Marriage.

BY C. W. C.

The following sentiments from the writings of Thomas Paine are taken from his early writings, originally published in the "Pennsylvania Magazine," of which he was the editor. They prove that Paine was a thorough radical and that he fully realized the evil, not only of political and religious slavery, but of sexual slavery as well; they prove that he was always in advance of his time (shall I say that his contemporaries were behind time?) that he was always a defender of the weak and oppressed and that he never bent his knee before Mrs. Grundy's altar. I am not a hero worshiper, and I have no desire to make a divinity of any man, but when I think of the life and work of Paine, I realize that he was a unique man and that he left no successor. His work shall be an inspiration to all lovers of freedom, and a rebuke to those freethinkers who fold their arms and do nothing or who wish to reduce freethought to an everlasting thrashing of old theological straws.

In an article entitled "Cupid and Hymen," Paine pictures the suffering of a young shepherd from whom his sweetheart had been stolen by Gothic, the lord of the manor. The shepherd complained to Cupid, and the latter berated Hymen as follows

"Know, Hymen, that I am your master. Indulgent Jove gave you to me as a clerk, not as a rival, much less a superior t is my province to form the union and yours to witness it But of late you have treacherously assumed to set up for yourself. It is true you may chain couples together like criminals, but you cannot yoke them like lovers; besides you are such a dull fellow when I am not with you, that you poison the felicities of life. You have not a grace but what is borrowed from me. As well may the moon attempt to enlighten the earth without the sun, as you to bestow happiness when I am absent."

Hymen replied that he had enlisted himself with another master and that he can do without Cupid. "Plutus (the god of riches) and I," said Hymen, "are greater than Cupid; you may complain and welcome, for Jove himself descended in a silver shower and conquered, and by the same power the Lord of the manor hath won a damsel in spite of all the arrows in your quiver."

The victory, however, was on Cupid's side. "The authority of Cupid was re-established and Hymen ordered never more to appear in the village unless Cupid introduced him."

Paine was a dreamer, and alas! some of his dreams have not become realities as yet. At the present day Hymen and Plutus are still very powerful and cause as much pain and trouble as they ever did.

In another article entitled "Reflections on Unhappy Marriages," Paine quotes approvingly the following sentiments of "an American savage."

"As soon as you ever meet you long to part, and not having this relief in your power, by way of revenge double each other's misery. Whereas, in ours, which have no other ceremony than mutual affection and last no longer than they bestow mutual pleasure, we make it our business to oblige the heart that we are afraid to lose, and being at liberty to separate, seldom or never feel the inclination."

If these are the sentiments of a savage, let us all become savages and life will perhaps be worth living.

I will conclude this note with a quotation from an article entitled "An Occasional Letter on the Female Sex." Says Paine:

"Man with regard to them, in all climates, and in all ages, has been either an insensible husband or an oppressor; but they have sometimes experienced the cold and deliberate oppression of pride, and sometimes the violent and terrible tyranny of jealousy. When they are not beloved they are nothing, and when they are, they are tormented. They have almost equal cause to be afraid of indifference and of love."

Such were the views of the man whose motto was, "The world is my country, to do good my religion," and whose eventful life was devoted to the emancipation of humanity from the chains of physical and mental slavery.

He who would free from malice pass his days,
Must live obscure, and never merit praise.

Sundry Comments

BY C. L. JAMES.

It is too bad Friend Hunt did not have his gun along when he went into the woods and saw that non distributio medii. If he had shot it and had it stuffed he would have known another at sight. That would have prevented his inferring that because Josh Billings sometimes made a just argument more forcible by adopting the phraseology of an ignorant person, the same method will make a bad argument less evidently bad. Ignorance is humorous only when it is affected. The reality is a melancholy thing enough. It is the true original sin into which we are all born, which none of us more than imperfectly get over, but of which a sensible man never boasts.

I see no reason why the "Philadelphia Press" should not publish advertisements for young ladies expert in "facial massage" and "manicure," which I always supposed to mean prostitution. As prostitution exists, on a large scale, in wealth and splendor, more or less regularly licensed and supervised, wherever civilization has advanced above the hedgerow kind, what's the good of pretending?

> It will but skin and film the ulcerous place,
> While rank corruption, mining all within > Infects unseen.

Papers like the "Press" and the Chicago "Dispatch" are doing just the same service to humanity that Stead did, in making the plain facts known. If they "execrate such papers as Lucifer" they are fixing a rod for their own backs; but unless Lucifer purges itself of regarding them with squeamishness, it, too, plays into the enemy's hands.

"Attempts to rationalize marriage" appear to be the special order. We have had them in quick succession from H. M. Parkhurst, Elmina D. Slenker and parties in Iowa whose names are withheld. All such attempts are just what would have been attempts to secure the natural rights of negro slaves. Slavery, plus a system of wages and eventually guaranteed emancipation, would not be slavery. Marriage under conditions of liberty for woman, would not be marriage, but free love. The beneficiaries of slavery and marriage have always perfectly understood these truths, and accordingly attempts to abolish, not the institutions, but their "abuses," have always been futile. They are made only because opponents of the abuses do not understand the institutions. Of this we may easily be convinced by study of those recent articles referred to.

H. M. Parkhurst is simply entirely mistaken when he says that "Marriage, like any contract, is an agreement made by the parties thereto in every respect which is not covered by statute law." The conditions of marriage in all its larger features, such as the obligation of the parties "to devote themselves to each other sexually to the exclusion of all others forever," and the right of the husband to exact the sexual submission of the wife, are fixed by common law. No contract of sexual partnership which dispensed with either would be held valid in unorganized territory where there are no statutes. The cases of Leo Miller, E. C. Walker, and in short every case of the kind which attracted enough notice for persecution, show that no free contracting is permitted. Accordingly, it is no longer the custom of lawyer to describe marriage as a contract. Bishop ("Marriage and Divorce") pointed out that the characterization was erroneous—that marriage had all the qualities of a status, and no quality of a contract, and as a status it has since, accordingly, been defined. The reason why we should put forth our energies at whatever hazard, to destroy the marriage laws, is that they are altogether bad and cannot be made good.

> "The truth is yours, and it shall make you free."
> So spake the teacher in rapt prophecy;
> Alas! how well that other text is learned,
> From prophets stoned and faithful martyrs burned;
> If truth alone can make us free in sooth,
> Freedom alone can give us perfect truth.

Crudities Criticised—No. 6.

BY FRANCIS BARRY.

E. C. Walker says more in Lucifer that needs to be said, than any other writer, and, minus his persistent misuse of certain terms, says it well. But if I were asked to name the most valuable single paper that has ever appeared in its columns I should name the report of T. B. Wakeman's address, appearing in Lucifer of October 29. Leaving out incongruities it is magnificent.

He calls Lillian Harman a "lecturess." She is a writer also, as well as a lecturer. Would he call her a "writeress?" If not, why not? He would probably say "instructress"; would he say teacheress? If not, why not? As he is in the "ess" business he would likely say Quakeress. Would he say Presbyterianess, Universalistess, Spiritualistess, Infideless and Freeloveress? If not, why not?

The whole "ess" business is a relic of semi-barbarism. Time was, in the semi-barbarous past, when the authors, lecturers, actors and editors were all men, so when one of these characters was named it was presumed that he was "a man" as a matter of course; so when a brave, sensible woman appeared, and gave a lecture or wrote a book, or otherwise encroached upon the masculine province, a new name must be found for the innovator. It is time the nonsense was done with. No person can say authoress, lecturess or editress without violating good taste and good sense.

It is a gross indelicacy to be forever referring to sex. In the past woman was looked upon as a creature whose use was the gratification of the gross and perverted masculine appetites. So long as sex is regarded as an improper thing, the less said about it the better. In freedom, woman free and equal, doing what comes in her way, there will be no occasion to particularize in regard to sex, more than in regard to other differences of authors, lecturers or tradesmen.

Wakeman tells us that chattel slavery and marriage had the same origin and have the same character. Intelligent people knew this before, but considering his character, ability and scholarship, he is an authority that is not to be questioned. In making this declaration he does freedom a service such as few are able to render. It is admitted that chattel slavery is a thing to be abolished. So too, marriage, as well. And those semi-reformers who talk about anything else than the abolition of marriage will understand that they have no place in the army of freedom unless they become converted to our principles and come into the ranks as fresh volunteers.

Wakeman talks about "free marriage." Seeing that marriage and chattel slavery are alike, indeed that marriage is the worse of the two, as he asserts, and as Parker Pillsbury has testified, why should they be handled so differently? Would Wakeman say "free slavery?" It would be just as sensible.

He tells us that "the co-operative republic with its 'social democracy' is the first and absolutely necessary condition of emancipated woman." We have heard this doctrine preached time and again. It is not true. It is vicious teaching. The "co-operative Republic" is utterly impracticable, and will be, so long as the masses are the product of marriage. The common herd have none of the essential characteristics of the subjects of a true government. The average voter of today doesn't know a statesman from a demagogue. The free woman will be the mother of the only population of whom anything remarkable can reasonably be expected in the way of reform. I believe in earnest and persistent agitation of all reform questions, but the question of woman's freedom is the basic one, and exceeds all others in importance.

While there is more or less truth in the idea that all reforms must and will go on together, it is absolutely true that woman can be free if women and men only believed in freedom, though not a step were taken toward any other reform. With a large blanket for herself and a small one for her baby, the free woman may pity the victim of marriage, though she dress in silk and fare sumptuously every day. Freedom in a cottage or in a hovel, is better than marriage in a mansion. It is nonsense to talk of woman's bettered condition as the result of better economic conditions if the bigoted and barbaric ideas as to morals still obtain. The sexual outrages of which woman has been the victim, not a millionth part of which has been told, have, in the largest proportion been perpetrated by well-to-do farmers.

Though seeming to find more in Mr. Wakeman's address to criticise than to commend, the value of his testimony as to the origin and character of marriage, is its most valuable feature, and justifies my use of the word "magnificent."

I wish always to be understood as criticising ideas and systems and never as finding fault with individuals. I want every man to choose his own work and to do it in his own way. If I shall succeed in doing my own work faithfully and well my ambition will be satisfied.

The Logic of Chivalry.

BY R. B. KERR.

Some people imagine that the sex question will be solved by simply giving women equality of opportunity with men in all branches of social life. Many advanced women are of this opinion. They say, "We do not want chivalry; only give us justice."

I can quite understand the feelings of those who talk that way. Having been denied equality so long, they think it is the most they can look forward to, and that there is no use expecting ever to get any more. Nevertheless, as a social ideal bare equality of opportunity between the sexes must be condemned as entirely unscientific and untenable.

There is a fundamental distinction between a man and a woman. A man is so constructed that all his powers can be applied to the advancement of his own personal objects. In him there is hardly any sacrifice at all of the individual to the perpetuation of the species. In woman, on the other hand, the individual is sacrificed to a great extent to the continuation of the race. A large portion of her body is connected with the functions of maternity, and a large amount of her energy is expended in connection with those functions and their organs.

The disabilities entailed on women by this physiological distinction are very great. In the first place, women are sometimes completely disqualified by it for other work. For some time before and after child-bearing a woman ought not to work. As it is necessary that all women capable of child-bearing should average three children or so apiece, in order that the population should not decline, it is clear that maternal duties must always interfere to some extent with individual efficiency. Then young children require a great deal of attention from their mother, and that takes so much more time away from the business of looking after number one.

Even women who have not children suffer from disadvantages on account of their physical structure. At certain regular seasons women have troubles which are very exhausting to many, and make it highly undesirable that they should be hard worked at the time. Moreover, they are so constructed that many things which are harmless to men are injurious to them. It is bad for most women to remain long in a standing posture, while it does not hurt men at all.

Even when she is strong and healthy, a woman is in many ways unequal to man in working power. It is evident enough that she is unequal to him in muscular strength, and that difference alone is very important in most manual occupations. But there is also reason to believe, from the experience of Lombroso and others, that the senses of women are less acute than those of men. This belief seems to be verified by reference to such of the fine arts as require great perfection of sense. Musical composition depends more than anything else on the perfection of one sense, and women have done less in musical composition than in anything else they have ever attempted. In poetry women have accomplished something by the high quality of their thought, and by their sympathy; but no modern woman has, in melody, rhythm or choice of words, approached within measurable distance of Shelley, Keats, Tennyson, or Edgar Allen Poe. Even in the fine art of cookery women have been hopelessly beaten by men. It is very evident that, if women are less keen in sense than men, they are at a great disadvantage in many occupations.

Even that is not all. So great a thinker and observer as Darwin has pronounced women inferior to men in "energy and perseverence."

On the other hand, we have the fact that Romanes has proved women to be quicker than men in perception and in taking in ideas. I think it will readily be admitted that they are also superior in carefulness, sympathy and tact. These advantages are of great importance in many occupations, but they are not nearly a sufficient offset to the other disadvantages.

The long and the short of the whole matter is that women are not able to fight the battle of life on an equality with men. They are rendered unable to do so by the fact that in them the individual is to a great extent sacrificed to the species. The advantages of these sacrifices are reaped equally by both sexes. Every man owes his own existence to these sacrifices just as much as every woman does. It is as necessary to a man as it is to a woman to have the services of the young in old age. These things being so, is it just that women should bear the burden of perpetuating the race without any compensation?

Those who believe that it is not just that she should bear the burden alone advocate chivalry, in the popular sense in which the word is now used. As women cannot work so hard and continuously as men they think it right that women should be maintained, in part at least, by the labor of men. As women are not so strong as men, they think it right that men should be more polite to women, and take more care not to hurt their feelings. As women are often tired and jaded from physiological causes, they think that men ought to look after the ease and comfort of women more than they look after their own.

Although women are often treated with less equality, happily they are also often treated with more. They are foolish to refuse chivalry when they can get it, because it sets a very bad precedent to refuse it. They are entitled to more than equality, and they should take it whenever they can get it.

In the July number of "The Adult" Egeria put the whole matter in a nutshell when she said, "chivalry is justice to women."

Preachers Up to Date.

On November 20, Rev. Myron Reid, of Broadway Temple, Denver, in his sententious way, speaking of football, said:

"I welcome a return to what was good in Greece and Rome. Neither of them declined because they did not keep the Sabbath. They declined as we decline—because a few had all the money and all the power. When the majority of the people are paupers and tramps, the sentence of that nation is pronounced.

Rev. David Utter of Unity Church, discoursing on "God's Love and God's Law," said:

"Persuade a man that he is not to judge for himself as to right or wrong, but that, distrusting his own powers he should submit himself to God's law as written in a book or presented in the teachings of an infallible church, and you have perverted his moral nature, and wat atrocities may result cannot be predicted. . . It is too much to think any one book a complete expression of God's word or law, and if it were, the case is little altered, for the virtue of a law is always in its application."

Dr. Cobern, of Trinity Church, observed during his sermon:

"I would not hold up the congregation of Trinity Church as a model, yet I would put the deaths in this church side by side with any insurance organization in the city and I think if our members were model Christians they would live still longer."

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE FIRST report of the organization called the "Free Propaganda," whose manager is Edwin C. Walker, of New York City, has been sent us for publication, and will probably appear in next week's issue.

The Outlook for Lucifer.

The near approach of the close of the current fiscal year, and beginning of the new, suggests the propriety of taking a retrospective, and also a prospective view of the situation, so far as our Light Bearer is concerned. The year has not been one of great prosperity for us, neither has it been phenomenal for its adversity. The steady decline, however, in the price of labor as compared with the price of gold-standard money, the steady decline of the opportunities to sell one's labor, caused by the introduction and private monopoly of labor-saving machinery—also caused by the multiplying of "trusts," and the narrowing of competition among the employer class, all these causes have combined to put it out of the power of Lucifer's subscribers—who are, in the main, wage-earning people—to renew their subscriptions, and has thus made it very difficult for us to meet the necessary current expenses of publication. The same causes have prevented our helpers from obtaining new subscribers to take the place of discontinuances made unavoidable by death or unusual misfortune.

The necessary result of all this is that we find ourselves unable, for the first time in the current year, to meet accrued bills for press work and blank paper, and hence we feel constrained, once more, to ask all who feel an interest in the continued life and usefulness of our "Son of the Morning" to make a little extra effort in its behalf.

We ask for no donations, as such; we ask only for fraternal, equitable co-operation. We ask all whose subscription has fallen in arrears to send us a little help, if only a few postage stamps. We ask all whose time is about to expire, to renew promptly, and all whose subscription is paid ahead to send to us for books and pamphlets in our line, for their own reading and for missionary work among those who are willing to read but are unable to buy, or who have never heard or read of Lucifer and its work.

Some anxiety has been expressed by old-time friends, in letters lately received at this office, in regard to what would be the fate of Lucifer in the event of the sudden demise of its old editor and publisher. In answer to this very natural query I will say that three years ago when my daughter, Lillian Harman, was conducting the paper during my enforced vacation in a Federal prison, I was so well pleased with her management that I made a will bequeathing the paper, its plant, subscription list, stock of books, "good will," etc., to her—with no restriction or instruction as to future management, and with no expression of preference as to whom she should select as her co-adjutors in the conduct of the business. This arrangement still holds, and while not at all apprehensive of a fatal ending of my present indisposition, I am glad to have this matter off my mind, and sincerely hope that the arrangement will be a satisfactory one to all who have faithfully stood with us in the past, and generally helped to sustain our "Morning Star" in its unequal struggle with the mists and fogs of ignorance, prejudice and superstition.

Some of these helpers have been with us from the first issue when eighteen years ago last August, our little journal in the form of a four-page monthly folio was born at Valley Falls, Kansas. Others have joined, later on, this original band of pioneers in an upopular cause, and have done and are still doing valiant and effective work in sustaining a publication whose distinctive merit, if it have any merit, is its championship of womanhood and motherhood, in other words, the emancipation of woman from sex slavery, believing this to be the first and most necessary step towards the complete and final emancipation of the human race from all slaveries—political, religious, social and economic.

With this brief review of the situation—present and past—I look forward with hope and trust, though not without a mixture of anxious solicitude, to the opening of the new year.

A Vacation Needed.

The following paragraph is part of a private letter lately received from one of Lucifer's old-time friends, co-operators and contributors—an officer of the "National Defense Association," prominent in the work of defending D. M. Bennett, Ezra H. Heywood, Elmina D. Slenker, the editors of this paper and many others, from the assaults of the Modern Inquisition. His name has become a household word among liberty-loving and justice-loving people wherever the English language is spoken or read.

MY DEAR MOSES HARMAN: Look here! It won't do for you to go on in this way. Your case needs prompt attention, for we can't afford to have you relax your hold yet. You are not sick, but have fallen into a low condition of vitality which always follows grippe, and you need to build up your whole system, or if you neglect to do so you will become as miserable as my poor father has become from the same cause. You are not good for anything for work while you feel as you do at present and you would better not try work. Take the advice of your friend and go away for a visit for a little while. There are only two things that will help you back to normal vigor: A radical change of scene, air and diet, and some good strengthening tonic taken regularly for a month or so. Almost any preparation of beef, iron and wine would do the business for you. Now don't neglect yourself, for you can't go on running down without some day getting to the end of your tether.

E. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

This letter was written in reply to one I had sent to him in answer to his inquiry in regard to my health. The advice given is very similar to that of Father Vincent, of Tabor, Iowa, founder of the "Nonconformist," whose letter we published in a recent Lucifer, and who sent a dollar to help pay the expenses of such vacation. Several others have joined in urging that a rest be taken, of a month or two in duration, as the only means of regaining what I have lost during my two months' illness.

Mr. Chamberlain very accurately describes the present symptoms of my case. I am "not really sick but have fallen into a low condition of vitality," a state of nervous prostration, so to speak; a lack of digestive and assimilative power, accompanied with insomnia or sleeplessness, resulting in loss of appetite, loss of strength, and of avoirdupois, twenty pounds reduction inside of two months.

The necessity of getting away from the office for awhile lies mainly in the fact that the temptation to work beyond my strength, while seeing so much that needs to be done, is simply irresistible. Since the first few days of my illness I have averaged daily perhaps not less than five hours of work, much of the time lying in bed or reclining a on lounge in the sitting room, with the result that my stock of energy was used up as fast as generated, if not faster.

The difficulties in the way of taking a vacation at this time are outlined in the talk about the "Outlook for Lucifer." The necessity for the practice of close economy in expenditure would seem to take precedence of every other consideration. Very cordial offers of hospitality and of care for the invalid have been made by some eight or ten of Lucifer's subscribers, but none of these friends live within one hundred miles of Chicago, and transportation is not free. In taking my outings in the past I have depended upon doing work enough, canvassing for new subscribers and selling books, to raise money to pay car fare. In my present condition, no work of this kind would seem advisable. A thought occurs just here that a compromise plan might be adopted. If the friends who have so kindly invited me to make their houses my home for awhile would agree to notify their neighbors of my coming, and invite them to meet me at their homes, to examine a small stock of books and pamphlets, something might be done to defray the expenses of rail, road travel.

Another difficulty is the uncertainty, the changeableness, of the weather in winter, requiring great care to prevent taking of colds, resulting in relapse or collapse. Short journeys, however, might be made with safety by keeping in close communication with the clerk of the "Signal Service Bureau."

In closing I wish to return sincerest thanks to all who have sent kindly sympathetic messages, or who have made offers of hospitality or assistance in any way, and also I wish in this general manner to offer my excuses for not answering each letter as it deserved, having no strength to spare to be used in private and personal correspondence. M. H.

Hilda's Home.

A telephone message from Regan & Co.'s Printing House one of the largest and most reliable of the printing and binding establishments of Chicago, informs us that the book "Hilda's Home" will be finished and ready for delivery "in four or five days" from this writing. This announcement would seem to end the long-drawn agony of delay, of disappointment and chagrin that has attended the publication of the story, first published as a serial in Lucifer. It is now something more than a year since we began taking subscriptions and money for the book, supposing that three months would be sufficient to complete the work. A history of the unlooked-for delays, the mistakes, the shipments and reshipments of material, all involving loss of time and money, would take much time and space and do little or no good. We are optimistic enough to hope that the vexation and worry over these truly exasperating delays will not result in the untimely death of either publisher or subscribers, and that all will be pleased with the book when it comes from the hand of the binder.

One chief cause, without reasonable doubt, of the "nervous prostration" spoken of under another head, is the mental worry attending the work of getting out this book. Having undertaken the revision of the matter, as well as general supervision of its publication, proof-reading, etc., I have continued to do this until a few days ago, or until the last pages were in type—the very last work being the writing of "publisher's preface," title page, etc.

And now while the chief source of worry seems at length removed, there still remains another, and by no means unimportant source of anxiety, viz., the financial. It may be evidence of lack of prudent forethought when we say that the money hitherto received on subscriptions for the book falls very much short of the amount required to settle remaining bills for press work and binding. To raise this deficit our plan is to send the book, as promptly as possible, to all who have subscribed and have paid for one or more, and to ask these subscribers to help us to raise the amount still due on the edition by becoming agents for its sale—providing, of course, the book meets the expectations of the long-waiting subscriber.

The edition consists of one thousand copies only—three hundred cloth bound, at one dollar each, and seven hundred paper bound, fifty cents each. It would seem strange, in view of the many and enthusiastic commendations received from those who have read the work in installments, if this small edition is not all sold within three months of the date of its publication. The book has four hundred and thirty-two pages, besides preface; printed on superior paper, with new, large and clear type. M. H.

THE DATA OF ETHICS, by Herbert Spencer, is a book needed in every library. Here is an opportunity to obtain a handsome copy of this masterpiece, practically free. We have obtained a small supply handsomely bound in maroon cloth, with gold lettering and gilt tops, printed in large, clear type on good heavy paper. It contains 350 pages, and is divided into sixteen chapters. Until the present supply is exhausted we will send a copy of this book to anyone who sends us the address of a NEW subscriber, accompanied by one dollar for Lucifer one year, and ten cents for postage on the book. This is an offer which you cannot afford to miss, and which we cannot afford to duplicate after these books are gone.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. By Herbert Spencer. 525 pages. Style of binding, paper, etc., similar to "Data of Ethics." Our stock of these books is small, but as long as they last we will send a copy of "First Principles" to any one sending us $1 for a NEW subscriber, and 13 cents for postage on the book.

* * *

Memorial Numbers.

Three late issues of Lucifer, numbers 737, 8 and 9, were largely devoted to the verbatim reports of the speeches delivered at the memorial meeting lately held in honor of the useful lives and heroic deaths of the five defenders of Labor's cause, who were foully murdered in the Chicago jail eleven years ago. Of these numbers we still have a fairly good supply, and will send a copy of the three to any address, postpaid for five cents in stamps, or in bunches of twenty-five for twenty-five cents. Again we thank the friends of freedom and justice for the liberality with which they have responded to requests for co-operation in getting the facts of this greatest of modern judicial crimes before the people, who, in the main, are still in dense ignorance of those facts—all owing to the persistent misrepresentations of the public press, and of those political leaders whose crimes were so truthfully and bravely exposed by the victims of judicial tyranny and perversion.

In connection with, and pertinent to, what has been said in honor of our heroic dead, I wish to say that I have lately been made the recipient of a much-valued present—a gold pen, once the property of that brave and true friend of his race, the unconquered and unconquerable August Spies. This pen was given by him to a lady friend of ours who now resides in Austin, Illinois, and who prefers that her name be not mentioned in this connection. The pen is an excellent one of its kind, well and tastefully mounted, and with a beautiful holder wrought from a piece of "ribbon agate" which our friend tells us was picked up by her in the Rocky Mountains. The occasion of the presentation to Lucifer's editor was a little surprise party gotten up by a few friends in honor of his sixty-eighth birthday.

Though late in mentioning this unexpected but very much appreciated honor, I wish to hereby return sincerest thanks to the dozen or so of Lucifer's faithful co-workers who, on the evening of October 12, met in the little parlor of Flat 1, No. 1394 W. Congress street, to express sympathy with the said editor in his illness and to wish him "many happy returns" his natal day—but under more favorable circumstances as to health. M. H.

Send $1 to us for Proudhon's "What is Property?"

Good News, If True.

In a recent letter R. B. Kerr says:

"You are, I think, mistaken in regarding the suspended sentence as a club held over Bedborough's head. The suspended sentence is a common English way of withdrawing from a prosecution with as little ignominy as possible. I have never heard of any man being called up to receive a suspended sentence. The government could not withdraw without offending some of the Puritans, and could not go on without facing a tremendous and irresistible agitation; therefore, it got Bedborough to plead guilty and then dropped the matter. It is just the Bradlaugh-Besant case over again. The Court of Queen's Bench quashed the Bradlaugh sentence on a technicality, and the police privately promised him to interfere no further with "The Fruits of Philosophy," or other neo-malthusian literature—a promise which they have faithfully kept ever since. Only two prosecutions in twenty-one years, and nobody punished in either case! That is a world-beating record. If you want to know how fast the world is moving read Chapter 3 of Macauley's History of England on 'The State of England in 1685.'

Stirpiculture. By Dr. M. L. Holbrook.

Dear Friends: I've one more good, interesting and useful book to call your attention to: "Stirpiculture," by Dr. Holbrook. I have just finished reading it, and found so much to appreciate and enjoy that I want "you all" to share the least.

There is no subject of more importance than the hereditary training of children. "As a twig is bent." But, as we desire straight trees and not bent ones, we must study how best to prevent all that mars the beauty of form, structure and mentality.

We are heirs to all the past, the climax of all that is, and the great marvel is how two minute microscopic sperm and germ cells contain all the possibilities of the future development resulting from the commingling, fusion and growing together of the substance of two such cells! These cells are formed o germules from all parts of the persons in which they are formed or found. "If no germules are given off from the brain then no brain can be developed from the egg," and the same with all parts of the body and mind.

Each person is the product of a multitude of ancestors, and the germ-plasm which produced them is never mixed in quite the same proportion, nor do the different parts grow with quite the same vigor, thus helping to make each person different from every other one.

I would like to quote whole pages from this valuable work, but after all, I could give you but a mere glimpse of the great mass of information it contains. It gives the summing up of a lifetime of study as well as that of a whole library of volumes on the subject, and gives it in so simple, plain and reasonable a form as to make it one of the most valuable books of the kind for the multitude, and yet very satisfactory reading for the scholar and the scientist. Such books give us a serene satisfaction in that which is, as well as excites a desire in us to know still more and better things. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Pleasantly and well suited I walk.
Whither I walk I cannot define, but I know it is good,
The whole universe indicates that it is good,
The past and the present indicate that it is good.
All forces have been steadily employed to complete and delight me.
Now on this spot I stand with my robust soul.

—WHITMAN.

Fagots.

BY R. E. GALBREATH.

Some people are so jealous that they cannot endure that their partners should sing a love song.

Many apparently act on the idea that their weaker desires may be satisfied, but their violent passions must not be satisfied nor even indulged.

I certainly endorse the Monroe Doctrine in the sexual relations. Friendship for all, entangling alliances with none. If marriage be not a tangler I know naught.

We hear people say, "It is nobody's business what are my sexual relations." Perhaps not. It is no one's affair what I pay for a suit of clothes, for what price I disposed of a fat hog, nor who visited me last Sunday afternoon, yet I am perfectly willing that any one asking may know these things. It is no one's right to interfere with me in the exercise of my sexual nature, nor am I as likely to be denied such exercise if am ingenuous about it, as if I give evidence of wanting it kept a secret.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXVIII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

REDEMPTION OF STOCK. A permanent investment of capital would enable the association to use it without equitable compensation. An effectual remedy for aggression is for the stock to be redeemable at the end of each year, upon three months' notice by the holder, at five per cent below par, subject to the penalty of the payment of double interest thereafter. On the other hand, upon like notice, the stock should be liab'e to be called in at five per cent above par, unless a stated diminution of the annual dividend hereafter is accepted. Ordinarily the stock would not be surrendered; for there would be no inducement to withdraw capital which received proper awards; and as large demands would be a warning to the council that its awards were not considered sufficient, or that there was some other serious error in the management. If the warning is heeded, the association suffers no loss. New investments will take the place of the few actual withdrawals. But if those in control persist in their course, they will be compelled either to reduce their operations or to pay to capital the additional rate while the stock remains unredeemed. Under good management there would always be a demand for the stock, unless the dividend should be reduced below what the capital will produce elsewhere.

These provisions only apply to stock expressly marked as redeemable. The proportion of redeemable stock would depend upon the degree of acquiescence by the stockholders in the award to capital and in the mode of management.

Lending a Hand

We gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following sums to sustain the publication of Lucifer—sent in response to the proposition of Henry W. Youmans and of others:

A Friend, Illinois, $5; H. Celler, Illinois, 50c; A Friend, Chicago, 50c; F. L. Avery, Mass., 50c.

Wanted—

Ten thousand names of women and men who do their own thinking, or who are willing to read what others think.

The season of long nights and short days is once more upon us—the season of reflection and of retrospection; the season when, if ever, such papers as Lucifer will be given a candid and thoughtful reading. With each weekly issue a surplus is printed to send out as sample copies—as pioneers, as evangels of the newer, and as we earnestly hope, better gospel than has yet been preached to the inhabitants of earth. These surplus copies have been accumulating for some months for lack of names and addresses of persons to whom a sample copy or two would probably be welcome.

The object of this paragraph, then, is to ask our friends to send us at once a list of names of persons to whom samples may be sent with reasonable prospect that the paper will not be consigned to the waste-basket or cook-stove.

And while sending the names, if a few stamps for necessary postage, should accompany the list, the favor would be much appreciated. But, please don't forget to send the names while the matter is fresh in mind. Please write the names and post-offices plainly—if possible with pen and ink, instead of pencil as many correspondents are now in the habit of doing.

VARIOUS VOICES.

B. W. Hilton, Greeley, Colo.—I hope you will forgive me for being so backward in paying for the little paper—little in size, but big in expression. I have had so many ways for what money I get, that I have stopped taking all the papers I used to take except Lucifer, and I want to take that as long as I can pay for it. I will send with this $1.50 to be credited on subscription.

R. S., Kansas:—Although "hard up" financially, I cannot afford to miss the fifty-two visits of Lucifer for a "measly" dollar. Actually I would rather miss four or five meals during the year than the fifty-two visits of Lucifer. I like E. C. Walker and his style of writing. I also like Rev. Holmes, and I hope the two named will "get together" on a compromise. Both agree on the ultimates and principles; they only differ on methods of attainment.

F. L. Avery, Ayer, Mass.—Noting your kind offer to give a copy of Spencer's "Data of Ethics," I enclose $1.10. Please send me the book and use the balance yourself. I will see that my subscription does not run out. I wish I could do more, but co-operation has absorbed all my surplus, and capital too, for that matter. Now I hope to be able to spare a little for freedom, and would dislike to see Lucifer miss even one week. Sex reform stands near, if not at the head of the list. Once get the race thinking enough to give woman complete personal liberty, standing on an equality with man in all things, and other reforms will follow as naturally as water seeks its level.

J. W. Stuart, Brodhead, Wis.—Today being Thanksgiving Day, and as I have passed my seventy-ninth birthday anniversary, it comes to my thought that the time for which I have paid for Lucifer is gone by one or more weeks, my dollar for another year's subscription should be sent you, also fifty cents for "Hilda's Home" in paper covers, will perhaps not be unwelcome so herewith find $1.50, for which please send the paper-covered copy of "Hilda's Home" and continue Lucifer another year. If I receive the book it will be an acknowledgement of the money and I shall have the satisfaction of letting my neighbors read of a higher state of society in which sex does not necessitate slavery.

W. F. Heath, Jaffray, N. H.—Enclosed I send twenty-five cents for the within named pamphlets. Some one sent me a copy of your paper, Lucifer, of March 30, '98. It was a surprise to me. I am glad to know that there are a few energetic souls striving to harmonize man's customs with God's laws. But what a thankless task it must be! If people could be induced to think, it seems to me that they must think themselves out of the old cramping ruts of custom, but alas! will they think? If you care to trust out your paper till spring to a stranger, you may put my name on the list. I will be sure to pay as long as I allow you to send it. I would forward money, but am an invalid, and my means are extremely limited just now.

[Yes, we will enter your name for three months, hoping your health and financial prospects will improve with the return of warm weather, if not before. Meantime, if you can become a co-operator with our "Morning Star" by lending its light to your neighbors the good work will be appreciated by us].

G. A., Neb.—I accidently ran across one of your papers some time ago, and was considerably impressed with it. I have been a reformer for some years, but never had thought much on the subject. I am a socialist and am in favor of freedom for the women as well as for the men. An article which I saw in this paper leads me to think that you might help me to a bit of information which I very much desire. I will state my case and leave it to you to decide whether you can help me or not. I am twenty-seven years old, have a wife and three children; am working for $55 per month, and you can see that I have all I can do to support my family. My wife's time is entirely taken up with her household duties and taking care of the children. What I want to know is, can you tell me of a sure prevention for conception. I do not desire to add any more to my wife's burdens; and outside of that consideration, I do not think it right to bring children into this world under present economic conditions. Can you help me?

[For the hundreth time, perhaps, we are obliged to answer in the negative. Our paternal government makes it a criminal offence to impart information concerning some of the most vitally important problems of life. The result is infanticide and often wrecked health if not premature death of the mother, else the birth of children for whom no adequate provision has been or can be made].

A. M. Morley, Datil, New Mex.—A Michigan friend sends m your memorial number of the Anarchists; also "Free Society" of San Francisco, being anxious, doubtless, to enlighten me on the question of Anarchy. However, I want to ask you to reserve for me one of Spencer's book, "Data of Ethics"—till I find an opportunity to send the money to you. I am out on a ranch far from railroad or commercial centers, but I want this book particularly as well as Lucifer. I'll try and send you the $1.10 our next mail day, and as such books cannot remain on hand, I embrace the first opportunity to reach you and avail myself of this unusual offer. I am going to study Lucifer, as the teaching compares with that of the great healer, Francis Schentter, whose hostess I had the honor and privilege of being in January, February and March, 1896, out here in these isolated mountains. He taught me many things. His prophecies have been fulfilled so far, and I am sure he is not dead as the newspapers affirm. He told me he would not die till "Father's work is done." I am believing he will return in '99, as that is the time he asked me and all to figure out in Daniel 12th chapter, as pertaining to his reappearance. Hence in the summer of 1899 the world will see, hear and know him again. Kindly grant me the above request regarding Spencer's "Data of Ethics" and also be assured of your money at the earliest opportunity.

GREAT COMBINATION OFFER!

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannised over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," R. G. WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents,

PERSONAL A well-educated, broad minded, liberal lady, neat in person, well preserved, not far from seventy years young—alone in the world, living in an orthodox village, wishes to correspond with single gentlemen, healthy, liberal, of excellent habits, neither poor nor rich, of about the same age. The years do not make us old so much as our thoughts. With good, clean habits and sound heredity the limit of life should not be under 85 or 90. Willing to go to any of Uncle Sam's new possessions to begin life and grow up with the country. All first letters may be directed to "M." care of Lucifer.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which had that did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governer has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information, Price 15 cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. II., No. 50. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, DECEMBER 17, E. M. 298. [C. E. 1898.] WHOLE No. 741.

Progress of the Peoples.

Upward, upward, press the peoples to that pure, exalted plane,
Where no throne shall cast a shadow and no slave shall wear a chain,

They have trampled on the fagots—broken crucifix and wheel,
Banished block, and thong, and hemlock, and the headsman's bloody steel;

Forced the Churchhold to surrender stake, and scourge, and bolt and bar—
Torn the keys from off its girdle—thrown the gates of Truth ajar;

They have forced the titled tyrants human rights to recognise,
And with bayonet and saber they have slain a legion lies;

They are lighting lamps of freedom on a million altar stones,
With the torches they have kindled at the blaze of burning thrones;

And this light will sweep and circle to the very ends of earth,
Touching with immortal beauty every heart and every hearth—

Thrilling every human being underneath the silent skies,
And transfiguring our planet to a perfect paradise!

Nay, behold! the light is burning with a strong and stronger flame,
And the foremost in the phalanx see the dark and stinging shame—

See the biting, blasting, burning shame of sex oppression now,
And, with hearts and hands uplifted, swear a grand and godlike vow,

That, despite the fangs of Custom and despite the Church's frown,
Womanhood shall wield its sceptre, womanhood shall wear its crown.

She hath borne with man his crosses, she hath worn with man his chains;
She hath suffered all his losses, she hath suffered all his pains—
She shall stand with him, co-equal, on the pure, exalted plains!

The age is too diffusive; time and force
Are frittered out and find no satisfaction.
The way seems lost to straight, determined action—
Like shooting stars that zigzag from their course
We wander from our orbit's pathway, spoil
A role we're fitted for to fail in twenty;
Bring empty measures that were shaped for plenty
At last as guerdon of a life of toil.
There's lack of greatness in this generation!
And why? Because no more man centers on one thought.
We know this truth, and yet we heed it not—
The secret of success is CONCENTRATION.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox

Anarchy and Anarchist.

BY JOS. RODES BUCHANAN.

As a warm friend to your brave little paper and its martyred editor, I wish to express my regret that the words anarchy and anarchist so often appear in its columns without any clear statement of what is to be understood as the position of the paper on that subject. The words have an established meaning—being to the multitude significant of a wild and turbulent impulse, tending toward assassination as a remedy for political evils, while the proper meaning of the word anarchy is the absence of government or a state of perfect freedom. But as the popular notion of anarchy is the destruction of government by rebellion or dynamite, such words should never be used without positive definitions, unless the man aims to make himself odious and alarm society.

The Utopian idea of the entire absence of government would be very rational if all men were angels of the better sort, but when we know that our country has about half a million of criminals of various grades, high and low, well dressed and dirty, those who talk of anarchy should tell us what they propose in the absence of laws and police officers to protect us from the thief, counterfeiter, burglar or assassin.

No doubt those who could afford to hire bullies and firearms would be as much of a protection as now, or even better, but the great majority would be at the mercy of these hired bullies and vagrant criminals until mob law or lynch law should grow from it to an established institution, which would be a form of government.

Our corrupt city governments, as it is, allow railroads to obstruct the streets and murder a man daily, on an average for a series of years, but without government of some sort, what would hinder a strong corporation from taking possession of all the streets, or even closing a street when they desire to do it? Anarchy would imply the despotism of corporations or a war between them and the people.

I do not say it would be impossible to get rid of our present style of city and state governments, but I have seen no plan proposed, and until some definite plan for introducing anarchy without mob violence and oppression of the weak shall appear, it seems folly to be urging the impracticable, and surrounding social discussion with a cloud of malodorous dust and general confusion.

When anarchy comes in, clubs for mutual protection would be promptly formed, and Judge Lynch would hold a regular court, but how we should manage the streets, fire-engines, water works, electric lighting, wharves, hospitals and jails is the first question. Revolvers would be in large demand and street battles quite bloody.

I have no objections to a good specimen of successful anarchy, and in fact have heard of some communities where neither constables nor jails, doctors or parsons, were known, but how would it work in Chicago? How long before a battle royal or a general conflagration would prove it a failure, and when rogues were caught who would decide their fate?

San Jose, Cal.

A FEW QUERIES.

The thoughtful article of our veteran friend suggests a number of queries, or lines of thought, that cannot be elaborated without taking up too much of Lucifer's limited space; such as:

Why is it that men are not "all angels of the better sort?"

Why should there be "a half million of criminals in this country," and who is it that is wise enough to draw the line between the criminal and the non-criminal classes?

Is not this distinction—this dividing up of mankind as criminals and non-criminals—as unscientific, as irrational, as that made by churchmen when they say all men are either "saints or sinners"—the saints consisting of "believers" and the sinners of "unbelievers?"

Is there not just a little of the "leaven of the Pharisee" in this attempt to put a part of our human brothers into a class to themselves and label them "the criminal class?"

With like heredity and like environment, would not we ourselves be "thieves, counterfeiters, burglars, assassins, bullies or vagrant criminals?"

And who or what is it that is responsible for the widespread depravity and imbecility that renders impracticable, if not impossible the "Utopian idea" sometimes called "anarchy," that is, absence of government of man by man?

To the mind of the philosopher or scientist there is nothing strange or wonderful in this wholesale depravity—this all-prevailing tendency to vice, to incompetency, to vagrancy and to crime. While mothers are compelled by law and custom to bring unwelcome children into the world, and while these newcomers, from early infancy find themselves disinherited—robbed by monopolists of their equal right to the earth, and its opportunities to earn an honest living, what can we expect? The wonder is, not that crime is so prevalent, but that it is not more nearly universal than now.

Is it quite fair to ask how anarchy would work in Chicago? Anarchy presupposes normal or healthful conditions. Anarchy implies equality of opportunity—equal opportunity to be born well and equal opportunity to natural wealth, after being born. How is it in Chicago? What is Chicago, anyway? Is it not a monstrous tumor? a diseased and disease-producing boil or carbuncle on the fair face of nature? Chicago is a fair illustration of the work of archy—government of man by man. Built upon robbery and murder, sustained by robbery and murder, we find here the extreme of wealth, of boundless extravagance and dissipation, side by side with the most abject and pinching poverty, the most hopeless, the most brutalizing, the most dehumanizing poverty. How can we expect such dehumanized specimens of humanity to adopt and practicalize anarchy?

To show that archy—government—is not the success its advocates would have us believe, we have only to mention that a large portion of the archist citizens of Chicago are now wearing "slip-knot" badges to indicate what they mean to do with the members of the city council if they should attempt to carry out the "Allen Law," the design of which law is to give a fifty-year street railway franchise to the Yerkes syndicate. That is to say, having found by experience that money can get anything it wants in the way of legislation the citizens of Chicago, as voiced by many of the daily papers, have decided that it is better sometimes to be law-breakers rather than submit to be robbed according to law.

Publisher's Preface to "Hilda's Home."

In the order of nature the ideal precedes the actual. In back-woods phrase, "The wind-work must precede the ground-work." "The ascent of life is the ascent of ideals." Ascent means action, change, involving effort, struggle, aspiration. Aspiration implies or presupposes DISCONTENT.

The author of the story, "Hilda's Home," preaches the gospel of discontent—dissatisfaction with the old, desire for the new. With Ella Wheeler she says,

> Be not content; contentment means inaction—
> The growing soul aches on its upward quest.
> Satiety is kin to satisfaction—
> All great achievements spring from life's unrest.
> The tiny root, deep in the dark mould h'ding,
> Would never bless the earth with leaf and flower,
> Were not an inborn restlessness abiding
> In seed and germ to stir them with its power.

The author of "Hilda's Home" preaches the gospel of Freedom—equal freedom, the gospel of Liberty coupled with responsibility. With Spencer she would say, "Every one has the right to do as he pleases so long as he does not invade the equal right of others." With Macaulay, Rosa Graul would say "The cure for the evils of Liberty is more liberty." Hence she has no fears that under Freedom the Home and the Family would cease to exist, or that woman will be less loving and lovable, or that man will be less manly and honorable. On the contrary she maintains that only in the soil and atmosphere of freedom is it possible for true womanhood and manhood to live and flourish.

While devoting considerable space to the subject of industrial reconstruction, the central aim of "Hilda's Home" is the emancipation of womanhood and motherhood from the domination of man in the sex relation. "Self-ownership of woman" may be called the all-pervading thought of the book now offered to the impartial and truth-loving reader. With Havelock Ellis in his "Psychology of Sex," Rosa Graul would say:

"I regard sex as the central problem of life. And now that the problem of religion has practically been settled, and that the problem of labor has at least been placed on a practical foundation, the question of sex—with the social questions that rest on it—stands before the coming generation as the chief problem for solution. Sex lies at the root of life, and we can never learn to reverence life until we know how to understand sex—So, at least, it seems to me."

A word of warning: Let no reader expect perfection in the following pages, either in ideal or in its manner of presentation. The editor and publisher offer this work to the reading public not for its literary merits, not for the excellence of its plan nor for the originality of its conception. The writer of "Hilda's Home" is a poor, hardworking, unlettered woman; one whose advantages in the way of preparation for literary work have been almost nil. The great, the distinguishing merit of Rosa Graul, as an author, is the simplicity, the naturalness with which she tells of the varied experiences that educate and prepare the various characters of her story for living in a co-operative home. For the life history of these children of her brain she is indebted, so she informs us, to the cold hard facts of her own experience and personal observation. "Experience teaches a dear school but fools will learn in no other," saith the proverb. The trouble with us all is that we are so slow to learn, even in the bitter school of experience. In no department of life is this comment so universally applicable as in the sexual or conjugal relations of women and men. Hence the necessity of plainness of speech and honesty of thought, on this subject, no matter how iconoclastic or revolutionary the thought may be.

Prominent among the criticisms made upon the economic ideal herein presented is the absence of all reference to the "Labor Exchange," and the apparent acquiescence by the co-operators in the old monopolistic financial system. In answer to this objection it may be said that our story was written some years ago, and before the publication of books on Labor Exchange and other modern economic reforms, and though an appendix was prepared to supply this lack, the addition would have increased the size of the book beyond its prescribed limits.

By others it is objected that an ideal home could and should be built without the aid of the millionaire's ill-gotten dollars. To this it may be replied that the earth with all it holds, including the accumulations called "capital," belong to the living present, and not to the dead past, and that if the legal heirs of past accumulations, the Owen Hunters of today, can be induced to build model homes for the use of those who may be ready to utilize them, there would seem to be no rational objection to such attempts at rectification of past wrongs.

To close this brief preface, which must serve also as introduction and appendix, let it be remembered that "Hilda's Home" is offered not as a final solution of all the problems of human life, but rather as a suggester of thought upon some of the most important and most perplexing of these problems. In all great reforms the public conscience must first be aroused to see the necessity of such change. If this unpretentious volume can be made the vehicle or means of helping to educate and stimulate the public conscience to the point of putting into practice the reforms advocated therein, the chief object of the author, as well as of editor and publisher, will have been realized.

Expression, Not Repression, Needed.

MY DEAR HELEN: You did not like to hear me speak of Edward Carpenter in connection with George Eliot and St. Paul? I should not have liked it myself, if I had been comparing them; but I was not. You know that I delight not in comparisons of degrees, but rather of qualities. My regret was that what he said made me think of what they felt. You ought not to have been so disturbed, for I have detected St. Paul in truth-telling, even to the telling of truths that lasted unto this day. And you know I like George Eliot very much indeed, when I do like her.

I was thinking of St. Paul's: "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak." We echo it often today, and it is not without a wide application that has never been outlived. But I think a well-knit human being ought to be, by this time, less distinctively and sharply flesh and spirit. And self-control, on which Carpenter dwells much, has come to mean the control of the physical by the spiritual. It is time these twain should have become one flesh. Advance can only be made by broadening one's self-capacity, not by narrowing its outlines. Carpenter would have the flesh less, that the spirit may be more; but expansion is the law of life and growth. A human being cannot be divided against itself with impunity. The sensual and the affectional always blend in proportion as the whole man or woman has evolved toward the unity of nature. But that either is stifled at the expense of the other is a thwarting and hampering of steady, symmetrical advance. It is good to have ourselves well in hand, so the rein guides always toward a real and understood good, actually wished for by us, not an artificial standard reared by a primitive and sightless Past, bent only on subduing all present gain. It is not sacrifice, but conquest that we need to learn. And there is—or there is to me—a tone of sacrifice about Carpenter's injunctions. He seems to have no doubt as to the spiritual life being purchasable with the physical.

I would not have any of the glow and fire taken from life. I would not have passion destroyed. I want it to move on, away from marriage and possession toward friendship and freedom. In the richest and fullest natures, sex expression will reach its height. We no longer make concessions to it as to an accidental and unfortunate faculty of beings destined to develop away from its need. Rather we learn its possibilities, that we may magnify self-expression through every channel.

I suppose it is because sexual passion has always been—in the working out of the race intention—an attribute of all men, degraded or otherwise, that it has become so associated with what is low that it can never lose its ugly sound except to the few. Doubtless it is true that most people are ashamed of it. At the best, it is regarded as something that must be apologized for. Even Carpenter, who is one of the few, always tacitly implies that when we are less physically, we shall—or may—be more spiritually; and that a certain spiritual tone toward the woman loved is secured by the denial or negation of the impulse to approach her and to say affection in any other than word form. Why? Are the unheard melodies more clearly perceived? Do we unlearn the art of singing that we may have more music in our souls? We may not think despitefully of the voice which music involves. Neither may we treat it as if it had no share in the beauty which it produces, nor otherwise with any mien of superiority. Rather may we always be loyal to it as part of ourselves. Why not recognize the fact that it is only the form of love expressed that has been a crude, blundering attempt, like all first attempts of man to come into his fullness of stature.

All the criticism that I felt impelled to urge against Carpenter was that his words do not ring clear enough on the subordination of any part of our nature to any other part being a desirable conquest only when undertaken in the interest of that which offers us a more complete and profound satisfaction. He treats one sense with a certain quality of disrespect, as something always to be negatived, to be held in abeyance, as if it were, in the nature of things, alienated from the emotional element in man. Only, in my efforts to explain, I may have unintentionally given the impression that he gives more prominence to the idea of sacrifice or subjugation than he really does. In fact, if he believed that offspring could be limited by other means than the complete denial of sexual life, he might have nothing to say that one would hesitate about accepting. Most other methods that have been employed are distasteful to him, nor can anyone take exception to his finding them so.

But Carpenter is never austere. The soul of the man is always turned toward the positive side of being, toward that which makes existence a joy and a positive good.

I am, again, not talking very much about magnetism. But you can see that love is to me too comprehensive in its significance to be used interchangeably with magnetism. The latter term, like many others, has become very much polarized. All such words, used constantly, and especially used technically, become thinned and even distorted in their meaning, until at last there is nothing to do about it but to discard them and find others. That is why we seize so eagerly words from another language. Perhaps, with many of the words for which we have no equivalent in English, our own form of speech has only lost the original significance, through the attrition of meanings foisted upon it—as for instance, our word "lust," which has been forced into evil company so long that it has lost all its good standing.

Purely physical magnetism has as little to do with love as propinquity has. Given the need for love or the need to love, it may furnish the way thereto. But love is in the heart-equipment of the lover and has neither wealth nor resource in any other factor. The limitations of physical magnetism are narrow and sharp, and one often painfully realizes its lack of endurance. Like everything else which we call purely physical, it lives not to itself alone in human beings. Every quality of the soul, every flash of mental power, has its own drawing force, and the charm of a soul akin to our own is immeasurably deeper than the most powerful of what we call magnetic currents, either in or apart from, human beings.

But—perhaps—still more of this another time. GIOTTO.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE CHICAGO SECULAR UNION will meet Saturday, December 17, at 8 o'clock p. m., in Dr. Greer's office at 52 Dearborn street. Members and friends invited to come.

WE HAVE occasionally received orders for the poems of Voltairine de Cleyre but were unable to supply them. We now have a small supply of the poems entitled "His Confession," "Betrayed," and "Nameless," which we sell at the published price—five cents each, or three for ten cents. As there are only six copies of "Betrayed," please name second choice in ordering it, as we will have to substitute one of the others for that poem when the meager number on hand is gone.

THE FLAMING METEOR. The poetical works of Will Hubbard-Kernan. With portrait and biographical sketch of the author. 270 pages. Fine, heavy paper, bound in cloth, with artistic design. This would make a handsome holiday present to any lover of poetry. Mr. Kernan's work is familiar to the readers of Lucifer, and needs no praise from us. On the first page of this paper will be found a selection from one of his finest poems. The price of the volume is $1, postage paid.

Now Ready.

The paper-bound copies of the long-delayed "Hilda's Home" have been received from the binder, and are now being sent to subscribers as fast as our facilities for mailing will allow. We are promised the cloth-bound edition this week, so that by the time this issue of Lucifer reaches its nearest subscribers those who have paid for bound copies should begin to receive their books. If, after waiting a reasonable length of time the books, whether in paper or cloth, do not come to hand, the subscriber will please notify us of such failure.

On second page of this issue will be found a reproduction of the "Publisher's Preface to Hilda's Home." This preface will give the reader some idea of the aim and scope of the story. As therein indicated the publisher does not expect unqualified praise of the book. Written, as it was, under most discouraging conditions, by a hand and brain wholly unused to literary work, the wonder is that the author succeeded as well as she did in portraying the hidden, the underlying causes of much of, if not most of the miseries and failures of human life.

Once more we ask for this book a fair and candid perusal by all who labor and wait for "the good time coming."

The "Free Propaganda" Organization.

Considerable space in this week's issue of Lucifer is taken up with a report of the work done and now in progress, by the organization known to most of our readers as "The Free Propaganda," whose manager is Edwin C. Walker. Mr. Walker's connection with Lucifer's work, in the various roles of contributor, canvasser, general agent, and also as—for several years—co-editor and co-publisher, dates back to the fall of '82, or, deducting a few intervals of longer or shorter duration, for a period of more than sixteen years. In all these capacities Mr. Walker has proved himself an able, earnest and very efficient helper. As a canvasser for subscribers Lucifer has never had his equal.

This report of the Propaganda work has been delayed somewhat in order that a comment thereon might appear in the same issue. Such comment, a column in length, was written and put in type, but fearing its animus might be misunderstood, and its wording misconstrued to the disadvantage o both Mr. Walker and myself, and not feeling physically able to write a substitute for that already in type, the whole matter is postponed to another issue. Holiday Presents.

The annual winter holidays are at hand and, with them, the time-honored custom of making gifts to friends now returns and demands recognition. The festival season or time of merry-making called Christmas, "Christmas-tide," is of very ancient origin, much older than the beginning of the so-called Christian era.

In all countries of the North Temperate and North Frigid zones there would seem to be substantial reasons for making this a time of rejoicing and giving of gifts. At this time the old year seems to die, and the new year to be born. Midwinter is a season of enjoyment, of repose and rest from the labors of the old year; hence the very natural desire to increase one's own enjoyment by making others happy, and thus, doubtless, arose the ages-old custom of making Christmas and New Year's presents.

Many of the readers and patrons of the Lightbringer will doubtless observe this ancient and honorable custom, as far as their means will permit. In making presents it is often difficult to decide what to choose—whether to select an article of permanent value or one that quickly perishes in the using. Among the gifts that combine beauty and use, and that may be kept as a souvenir for many years, there is nothing that surpasses a good book—a book whose matter will have an educating, a refining, an ennobling, a happifying influence on the mind of the reader.

In this book-making age the readers of Lucifer will not lack for offers of desirable books from which to choose presents for friends, young or of maturer age. These readers do not need to be reminded that the publishing house located at 1394 West Congress street, Chicago, is a competitor for their patronage, and respectfully asks a share of their winter book trade.

Among the books we offer and recommend as suitable for holiday presents are:

(1). "First Principles," by Herbert Spencer; with appendix and copious index of subjects, 508 pages, same style of binding, type, etc., with "Data of Ethics"; price fifty cents; postage, 13c.

(4). "Perfect Motherhood, or Mabel Raymond's Resolve," by Lois Waisbrooker; 345 pages, well bound in cloth, with portrait of the author; price, $1.

(5). "The Flaming Meteor," Poetical works of Will Hubbard-Kernan; with portrait of the author and life-sketch; 270 pages, very tastefully and substantially bound in cloth; price, $1.

(6). "Dreams," by Olive Schreiner, to which are added "Evangeline, and other poems by Longfellow; tastefully and artistically bound in cloth; 191 pages; price thirty cents.

(7). "Karezza. Ethics of Marriage," by Dr. Alice B. Stockham; 136 pages, flexible cloth; price $1.

These are a few only of the books published or sold by us that we think very suitable for holiday presents. For fuller list please write us for catalogues.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Well knowing how hard it is to get a dollar of the "money of the realm," which means the money of the banker, and of the privileged classes generally, we hereby make this additional or supplementary offer:

For every dollar sent us at one time for books we will send free, twenty-five cents' worth of our pamphlet literature, including the seven numbers of "Our New Humanity," and all other pamphlets issued by us that are not now out of print, together with many others that have been, from time to time, advertised and sold by our publishing house. This offer does not include postage. Some of the books are large for the price; hence to avoid loss we ask that postage be sent with orders for free literature.

Asking for liberal co-operation in what we believe to be the "hope of the world," namely, the cultivation and development of higher and better ideas and ideals, we, of the Light Bearer office herewith and once more send forth to our friends and helpers, the world round, our

MERRY CHRISTMAS AND HAPPY NEW YEAR!

The Question of Enlargement.

Several letters containing suggestions and propositions looking to enlargement of the Light Bearer have been received within the past few weeks, but owing to the prolonged illness of the editor and publisher but little attention has been paid to them. The close of the current year and beginning of a new volume would seem to be an opportune time to consider questions relating to enlargement and to increase of the efficiency and usefulness of our "Son of the Morning." What have our friends and helpers to say on this subject? Short communications, either for publication or not, giving the views of those whose co-operation in the past, gives them the right to advise, will be in order at this time.

A Wicked Woman Steals the Baby She Had Borne, and is Sent to Jail.

It was a lucky thing for James O'Neil, of Bridgeport, that he bought a marriage license which made Mary—other name unknown—his wife, and gave him the ownership of the child which she should bear. So, when he and she separated recently the baby was given to him by the County Commissioners. The New York "World" heads its report of the case:

"MOTHER'S LOVE LEADS TO PRISON.

"Mrs. O'Neil's mother love was strong and on Wednesday she stole into the house of her husband's sister and kidnapped the baby. The police arrested the mother, but she refused to reveal the whereabouts of her child.

"'It is my child,' she exclaimed in the police court yesterday, 'and I will not let you take it away from me.'

"'Thirty days in jail,' said Judge Comley, and the mother was led away to jail, still refusing to tell where the baby was. Later the little one was found with a friend of Mrs O'Neil."

In ante-bellum days the slave-child was torn from the arms of the slave-mother by the white owner, and the hearts of innumerable men and women bled in sympathy. Thousands of lives and millions of dollars were sacrificed in the effort to abolish slavery. But what about this latter-day slavery? Marriage, it is claimed, is an institution maintanied for the protection of women and children. Yet, if this mother had not been married to the father of her child, the attempt to keep her baby would not have cost her a month's imprisonment.

What a horrible commentary on "the sanctity of marriage" is this! And this is not an isolated case. Just so long as the marriage law justifies child-stealing, just so long will that law stand self-condemned. L. H.

The Crime of "Society."

In Liverpool last week, Lieutenant Wark was condemned to death. Probably he was not the only man to receive that sentence, but the remarkable feature in his case was the way in which the sentence was received by the public. After his sentence "The men and women rose in the court and scrambled over the seats to shake him by the hand, shouting 'Good-bye and God bless you'!" The report also states that "The general feeling is strongly adverse to the verdict and sentence. An extraordinary demonstration was made against Judge Phillimore as he left the court."

The man's crime was that though married, he loved a girl and the result of their mutual love was prospective disgrace for her. She could not endure the prospect, and wanted to have an operation performed. He opposed the idea at first, but finally consented, saying that he would stand by her to the end. He was in another city at the time, but when he learned of her serious illness he hastened to her, though he was unable to reach Livepool before her death.

"After the jury found him guilty of aiding and abetting Miss Yates in performing an illegal operation which resulted in her death," he addressed the Court, protesting his innocence. Some of his remarks were as follows:

"Because I chose to stick to Miss Yates like a man, I now find myself convicted, though if I had chosen to throw her over like a discarded toy, no doubt all would have been well.

"My letters have been cruelly and wrongly interpreted, and a great number of letters have been kept back that would have proved my innocence beyond doubt. According to scripture, 'Twice cursed is he who removeth his neighbor's landmark,' but I say, 'Thrice cursed is he or she who keeps back evidence will fully which would prove a man's innocence.' . . .

"It is due to my own wife to say that through all she has been the best of wives and mothers. . .

"But having won the girl's love, and she having placed implicit trust in me, how could I throw her on one side? I stuck to her to the bitter end and it was no fault of mine that she did not die in the arms of the man she loved, as I was on my way to her on the day of her death."

Here are the lives of two good women and one man and several children sacrificed to the fetich of "respectable society." Both women loved the man and he loved them. Miss Yates is dead, and her unborn child was needlessly sacrificed. Wark must die, and Mrs. Wark and his children must suffer because of his death. Can any one be found who has been benefitted by all this misery? L. H.

The First Year of the Free Propaganda.

BY E. C. WALKER.

It has been several months since I reported progress. During that period I have been in correspondence with nearly all the subscribers to Lucifer, and with others likely to be interested in the work. Rather, I have written to these persons and have in consequence had a more or less extended correspondence with a certain percentage of them. This form of approach followed the earlier one of statement and appeal through Lucifer, and is in turn succeeded by a recurrence to the first.

Shortly after the first of this month of November, the secretary-treasurer and manager of the propaganda sent their reports to all members, with blank ballots to be filled by members in the active class with the names of persons desired by them as officers for the present year, and with certain questions as to correspondence, to be answered by members in both classes. My next letter to Lucifer will announce the result of the election and show how many have renewed membership, as well as changes from the contributors to the active class. The reports of the Manager and the Secretary-Treasurer follow.

MEMBERS OF THE FREE PROPAGANDA, GREETING!

We are nearing the end of the first year of the organization. It has been a year of hard work for the Manager, but, taking all difficulties into consideration, the results are as satisfactory as could be expected. There are now eighty women and men on the list of membership. Forty-eight of these (thirty-four men and fourteen women) are in the active class, twenty-nine (eighteen men and eleven women) are in the contributory class, and three (two men and one woman) have not answered my questions regarding classification.

When communications in Lucifer no longer brought in new members, I resorted to letter-writing, sending out twelve hundred circular letters, with as many personal notes and copies of Nos. 1 and 2 of the "Bulletin." Nearly all these letters went to Lucifer's subscribers, a few being sent to other Radicals whom I knew or of whom I knew. This effort increased the number of members by about a half, gave us most of the sum designated "donations" in the report of the Treasurer, and cheered us with many hearty commendations of the work by men and women who promise to join hands with us when they can "spare the dollar."

With a prompt payment of membership dues for the second year we shall be in a much better position to prepare and distribute leaflets and small pamphlets. Up to this time, using most of our very limited means in enlarging our membership, we have not been able to do much printing and so have been compelled to use in the general propaganda only papers and the cheapest pamphlets now in the market. It is the common story—if we had a little more money with which to work we should spend less in reaching the same number of persons.

So soon as the terribly busy Manager can save up enough minutes to make a few hours, he will copy for Lucifer some of the many good things his correspondence brings him.

Were not our members so widely scattered, we would have met in Chicago at the time of the Secular Union Congress convenes, but as not more than half a dozen, at the most, are likely to be present on that occasion, and among these few none of the active formers and but one of the officers of the association, the original plan was abandoned and this put in its place. This possesses the advantage of permitting all active members to take part in the proceedings, and at small cost to themselves. None lose anything hereby, for we could have no public meeting in Chicago with so very small an attendance from the outside, while the absence of the expected business convention need not interfere with the social enjoyments of the few comrades who do meet in Chicago at that time.

This report, the treasurer's report, and the list of active members, with questions concerning correspondence, are sent to all members and to outside donors to the fund.

E. C. WALKER, Manager of the Propaganda.

In addition to this cash balance, we have ten (10) copies of "A Physician in the House" ($2.75 each) kindly donated by the author, Dr. J. H. Greer, to be sold for the benefit of the Free Propaganda. Who will first order a copy?

Some who have not paid dues for the first year are very poor, but are good workers, too good to be refused admission. Most of the other delinquents are—not too good but too slow. May they take the hint!

ANNA STIRLING, Treasurer.

The reader will bear in mind that these reports were prepared and sent out before the Congress convened, which accounts for the tense. This information accompanied the reports:

The officers of the Free Propaganda for the year ending November 18, 1898, are:

President—Lillian Harman.
Vice-President—
Secretary-Treasurer—Anna Stirling.
Manager of the Propaganda—E. C. Walker.
Legislative Agent—James F. Morton, Jr.

The officers to be elected for the year ending November 18, 1899, are a president, a vice-president, a secretary-treasurer, a Manager of the Propaganda and a legislative agent.

Officers are elected by votes of the active members.

The officers are to be selected from the list of the active members.

The active members are Mrs. E. A. Abbey, James W. Adams, Robert C. Adams, F. J. Afflhauser, H. C. Allen, William Broadbelt, A. A. Caswell, Edward W. Chamberlain, Adeline Champney, John Moseley Clarke, Lelia J. Drake Clarke, Cyrus W. Coolridge, Charles B. Cooper, William D. Denton, Flora W. Fox, Ralph E. Galbreath, Lillian Harman, Dr. J. O. Hatten, James Haworth, O. B. Hescock, Otto C. Heuple, May C. Hurd, Frank Lang, Jesse Lee, A. G. Lengberg, Sven N. Lindall, George Makert, A. Louise Minchen, Virgie C. Moon, James F. Morton, Jr., E. J. Paul, Myra Peppers, Abner J. Pope, Dr. Oscar Rotter, Rose Turnbull, Elizabeth H. Russell, Amy L. Scudamore, Ella Slater, Fred L. Small, Ambrose Sorenson, Anna Stirling, C. L. Swartz, Henry R. Thayer, J. G. Truman, E. C. Walker, Ernest Winne, C. R. Welker, Henry Youmans.

The close of the second year should see the list of membership quintupled, taking the two classes together.

Notice.

Some friends of Emma Goldman, remembering the success of her last lecturing tour to the West, have received her consent to make arrangements for lectures at intermediate points—the lecturer to start from New York the latter part of next January. Comrades desiring further information will write to Emma Goldman, 50 First street, New York.

It has also been deemed advisable to start a fund to cover the traveling expenses, and those wishing to assist may do so by sending their contributions.

Miss Goldman's subjects are:

"Sex Problems."
"The Power of the Idea."
"Theory and Practice. A Criticism on Ethics."
"Politics and its Corrupting Influence on Man."
"Trades-Unionism; What it is, and What It Could Be."

Meetings have been arranged in Barre, Vt., Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and the mining districts of Western Pennsylvania, Chicago, St. Louis and other places. Those desiring lectures by Miss Goldman should communicate with her as soon as possible.

VARIOUS VOICES.

E. F. Rotsbeck, Steilacoom, Wash.—Enclosed please find stamps for six months' subscription—fifty-five cents—the five cents are what it would cost to pay for money order and war tax, and will, I think, do you more good than the present Uncle Sam. I don't like to pay a war tax anyway.

Essa B. Taylor, South Pasadena, Cal.—Enclosed find one dollar, for which please extend my subscription to Lucifer another year. I believe it expired with No. 736. I was sorely tempted to wait until after Christmas before sending the money, as I very much wanted to use it otherwise. But I said to myself, "If other subscribers also fail to pay up when due, where's the Harmans' Christmas coming in?" My better nature prevailed, so here's your dollar—it belongs to you.

Anton Merakergaard, Sioux Falls, S. D.—FRIEND HARMAN: I take the liberty to call you my friend. You are not mine only, but a friend of all the oppressed and suffering humanity. Inclosed find one dollar for your staunch Lucifer for '99, and twenty cents for the book, "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs." I wish I had the means to send you more money for your bright Lucifer. I will try my best to get some subscribers for you if possible. It is worth while to help such a cause along.

William Schemenour, Waterville, O.—Mr. Charles Gano Baylor's article in "Various Voices," No. 739, is very interesting, and his query, "Will some one of Lucifer's readers explain?" I will say, yes. I for one would like to make the attempt, but to do so would take several columns of Lucifer's limited space, and Brother Harman has not yet said he would add one or two pages more to the size of his paper—such additional expense to be borne by those who might want to come into the arena. I trust Brother Harman will consider the matter. Mr. Baylor has signified his willingness to contribute. If such space can be secured without too much cost, let it be so stated in the paper. No doubt there are others who would like to answer Baylor's article, if space did not forbid.

[The question of enlargement has been under serious consideration for some months, but the prolonged illness of the editor and publisher has prevented hitherto, any statement of the pros and cons. We shall be glad to hear what others think of the proposed enlargement of Lucifer's space].

O. W. Lee, LL. M., Des Moines, Iowa:—As the author of the article, "An Attempt to Rationalize Marriage," in Lucifer, No. 738, I accept the hint of the good editor and will "enlighten" those interested as to facts. It is a copy, or nearly so, of a bonafide contract in which I am one of the parties. It was not executed with a belief that it would ever find its way into court, or if so, be accepted there as anything but "a contract against good morals," and therefore "void" in the eye of the interpreter of statutes—judges—called courts. If the parties to it cannot live up to its every provision, God knows that no combination of individuals in numbers, styled "society," "courts," "Comstock Purity Leagues," or what not, can coerce or enforce it, or any single provision therein. The words, "As in a like co-partnership, neither partner" should read, "Like a co-partnership, neither," etc.

It was executed with a belief that it would furnish an adjustable foot-bridge between darkness, as it now exists—in marriage laws and customs—and the light of the brighter days that are unquestionably beginning to dawn. Can one do more for freedom's cause with own hands and body free, than to let the mind lead them into certain prosecution?

This "foot-bridge," in the form of contract prior to marriage, has, so far as it has been tried, proven an easy way for me to pass from darkness into light. It might not do so for another individual, save the solitary "she" who has tried it! Could we have brought light to a greater number of others by a defiance of society's dictum?

The Judge of the District Court administered, not "the usual nuptial oaths," but the one promise, "Do you take this woman as your legally wedded wife," and turning to the woman, "Do you take this man as your legally wedded husband." As a matter of fact a license to marry was issued by the clerk of the court, in due form, and of course the usual record and return were made for the archives of the county; otherwise persecution and perhaps prosecutions would have followed.

No officer of the church, nor an inferior officer of the civil government (one not being permitted to help undo a wrong, if it proves to be such, wherein he is a party participant) could act for or with me in the capacity of "solemnization?"

The unity of life assures me that we shall progress toward harmony just in proportion as we serve (love) humanity and freedom the more. Having taken a step from darkness into light we can with confidence expect to take other steps with equal results, and each step in advance makes the darkness of the past like a departing dawn, when the sun appears. The copy of the contract and this article are but hints, and are not thought to be the expression of a fixed opinion. I would be pleased to hear from any Lucifer reader, pro or con.

Elsie Cole Wilcox, Lawrence, Wash.—William Schemenour, No. 735 makes the suggestion that those who desire to air their views in Lucifer combine to enlarge the paper. No doubt every lover of the cause Lucifer represents would be glad to have the paper enlarged. But Mr. S. should bear in mind that the great mass of Lucifer's readers are of the class not raised to affluence by the great wave of McKinley prosperity. Most of us do all we are able to when we rake up a dollar for the regular subscription, with an occasional quarter or dime for a "benefit fund" or for pamphlets to circulate among the "great unwashed." Seems to me a cheaper way, and one likely to be as satisfactory to the average reader, would be to lay such constant contributors as the three or four who usually monopolize every issue, on the shelf for a week or two and give the space usually occupied by them to the accumulated mass of readable articles said to litter the editorial desk.

Not a week passes that Mr. Walker is not heard from. Is it fair to the other contributors to continue to side-track everything else to give him from two to four columns every week? Mr. Walker is an able writer, a clear, logical reasoner, and always interesting. But with all due respect to him, I beg to suggest that his varietist theories should be put in practice in literary as well as in sex matters.

It is just possible that some of Lucifer's patrons might prefer to read the writings of other contributors just for a change. Suppose for two or three weeks Mr. Walker, Rev. Holmes and the three or four others who have monopolized two-thirds at least of Lucifer's space for the past year, should just step aside and keep still and let Mr. Harman and Lillian fill up the papers with the best of the deferred articles. I fancy they would be all the better for the rest, and would have a chance to re-read their articles, and some of the writers might not care to have the articles published after the second reading. This will be a much cheaper way out of the difficulty, and then those who have a little cash to spare can give it for the support of the paper in its present form. It needs it. But, if it has reached that point where its pages are to be monopolized by a few, and the many must pay for the privilege of being heard, I predict a speedy downfall of the dear old paper.

Very few will respond to such a call, and there is a growing dissatisfaction with the present monopoly. With kindly feelings and sincere admiration for all the contributors, I make this suggestion, believing it to be in the interest of the paper.

["Hear all sides" is Lucifer's motto. Mrs. Wilcox gives us a plainly worded statement, as she sees the matter, in regard to the enlargement proposition of Mr. Schemenour. If she had worked in Lucifer's office as many years as some of us have done she would probably see things in a somewhat different light. While it is true that Mr. Walker has been accorded much of Lucifer's space within the past year—in fact for several years past, it is certainly not true that "not a week passes that Mr. Walker is not heard from," nor is he given "from two to four columns every week," etc. In selecting matter for the weekly Lucifer, its editor has been governed, mainly, by two considerations:

First, and chiefly, suitability of matter, clearness of style, state or condition of manuscript offered, length of article, etc. In these regards the editor must assume and exercise autocratic powers—necessarily so. He must be the arbiter, from whose decision there is little or no chance for appeal.

Second. It is well known that no journal, devoted to radical and unpopular lines of thought, can be made to reach many readers that does not receive voluntary and unpaid help in money, time or labor. In human ethics we recognize that there is such a principle as equity. Equity, if I understand the term, would give more of the space of such journal to him or her who has contributed most, either in time, labor or money to make that journal live, than it would to her or to him who has simply paid the usual subscription price. Applying this rule to the case under consideration, I do not see that any reader has cause to complain that Mr. Walker has been a "monopolist." Measured by this standard he has not occupied more than his equitable share of space in Lucifer's columns.

While thanking Mrs. Wilcox, and all who may think as she does in regard to the question of monopoly of space, for the kindly interest she and they have manifested in Lucifer and its work, I would respectfully ask a suspension of judgment until the real facts, not simply the apparent or one sided facts, in the case can be presented. "Hear all sides, then decide." 28 chapters; 478 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eye-witnesses, the threats of mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.27, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's masterpiece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 386 pages. Price, 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

"Loma"—A CITIZEN OF VENUS," by Prof. Wm Windsor. A story of surpassing interest, largely devoted to Sexologic and Sociologic problems. Like Bellamy in his "Looking Backward," the writer of "Loma" believes in the "state," as a factor in social evolution, but individualists will probably forgive this feature for the sake of the radically revolutionary ideas in regard to popular theories—sexologic, theologic, cosmologic, etc. Substantially printed and artistically bound. Price, post-paid, $1.50. Address this office.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

PERSONAL A well-educated, broad minded, liberal lady, neat in person, well preserved, not far from seventy years young—alone in the world, living in an orthodox village, wishes to correspond with single gentlemen, healthy, liberal, of excellent habits, neither poor nor rich, of about the same age The years do not make us old so much as our thoughts. With good, clean habits and sound heredity the limit of life should not be under 85 or 90. Willing to go to any of Uncle Sam's new possessions to begin life and grow up with the country. All first letters may be directed to "M." care of Lucifer.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Howdier on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 15 cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. II., NO. 51. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, DECEMBER 24, E. M. 298. [C. E. 1898.] WHOLE NO. 742.

Master of His Fate.

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud
Under the bludgeoning of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed.

Beyond this place of wrath and tears
Looms but the horror of the shade;
And yet the menace of the years
Finds and shall find me unafraid.

It matters not how straight the gate,
How charged with punishment the scroll—
I am the master of my fate;
I am the captain of my soul.

"Chivalry" an Unnecessary Evil.

BY C. L. JAMES.

"Chivalry," says Egeria, "is justice to women." I think it would be nearer the exact truth to say that chivalry is an apology for injustice to women. The nature of this apology is fully explained in Lucifer, 740, by R. B. Kerr. whose conservative spots I regret to be finding out.

"As women cannot work so hard or continuously as men . . women should be maintained, in part at least, by the labor of men." That is identically the theory of chivalry, hitherto in full operation. But "the days of chivalry are over!" In this age of wonderful inventions against which the mediæval knights must needs be as powerless as a Spanish cruiser against one of our own improved murder-machines—see Mark Twain's story of a "Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court"—there is no necessity for either sex to work harder or more continuously than a woman can ordinarily do very well. If the capitalistic system imposes an unreasonable burden on the workers, as it most unquestionably does, that is merely a reason why every useful woman should be, and soon will be, even more of an Anarchist than every useful man. As to that period during which it really is unsuitable for a woman to work, the new woman will—does already—take care not to enter it without securing either a reserve fund sufficient to tide her over, or a sufficient guaranty of the assistance of the man in the case. The female being the least amorous sex, there is no difficulty about that when women are free.

Neither the original Egeria nor the Amazons, types of the new woman, found it necessary to invoke chivalry. They "bossed" in sexual matters, as the female always should. It is only the woman compelled to gratify masculine desire and bear unwelcome children, who has any need of an apology for injustice.

The arguments by which Mr. Kerr endeavors to show that sexual dominion is not generally practicable for woman—because this is really what his contention amounts to—have a strangely familiar sound. "It is necessary that all women capable of child-bearing should average three children or so apiece in order that the population should not decline." I scarcely think it would be any great evil if the population did decline in quantity and improve in quality. But granted it would, at that rate of increase the progeny of one pair would in thirteen centuries amount to 289,000,000,000. Shade of Malthus! that won't do.

It is necessary that all women capable of child-bearing shall have less than three children apiece that the population may not be kept down by the positive check of premature death. As to the observations of Darwin, Lombroso and Romanes, on the comparative activity of the faculties in men and women, they may or may not be just, for women as women are. But we should remember that women have only very lately begun to have anything like the same cultivation for their faculties as men. Women have not yet proved that they are by any means as often gifted with original genius as men, but in talent—the capacity to do well, and with small improvements, what has been done before—they have, since their partial emancipation, proved fully equal to men. And this is the bread-winning faculty. Genius doesn't pay. On the whole, I am still of John Stuart Mill's opinion that until women and men have been educated to like pursuits and followed them, for a much longer time, we are not justified in saying there is any natural difference of mind between the sexes—still less as to pronouncing as to what that difference is.

Is a Free Life Practicable?

[Copies of the following letters have been sent to us for comment, and as we think them interesting as giving a glimpse of real life, we reproduce them in Lucifer. They will doubtless be found self-explanatory. L.]

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND: Since seeing you I have been thinking about what you told me about your daughter and her lover.

I shall be plain and say just what I think, and if I hurt your feelings you must remember that our very best friends are those who tell us our faults. If I am wrong I am anxious to be set right.

I always supposed that free love was the interchange of love between two persons, with the intention to live together as long as they satisfy each other, and whenever the time comes they do not love each other they should separate. You told me that they are living together when she knows it may be only temporary. Now I think it an awful thing for you, her mother, to encourage her in doing so. I can't see that it is anything different from prostitution. If he was a married man and lived unhappily at home, I think it would be more excusable, for in this case he could live with her right along. She puts herself in a position where she is obliged to violate the law of nature which says to the woman, "increase and multiply," and she runs the risk of permanently injuring her health.

Now I have thought much about this and I can't see how you could in any way encourage her in doing this thing. Of course it is a very pleasant thing for him, because he can leave her just as soon as he wants to, but how will it be for her? It is all very well, perhaps, while she has youth and beauty, but how will it be when she gets older and not so attractive? Do you think it is right?

I tried to imagine myself encouraging my daughter to do the same, and I think I should rather see her dead than encourage her to do such a thing.

I think you are a woman of good judgment in many things but I think you are going so far in this matter that sometime or other you will regret it.

Enough on this subject; let me write on something else. While reading a magazine the other night, one paragraph impressed me as being nearly right. It is:

"Better the Vedanta philosophy, better Nervana; better the Zingari's trust in the Great Name and the healing band; better the wild man's Great Spirit, than no philosophy, no belief, no trust, no hope, either in this world or the next."

I have not derived as much pleasure in my skepticism as I thought I should. If a person really believes in a future state, and that if he leads a good life here he will have a beautiful mansion in another world, and believes that God is a loving father and is always ready to help us if we call on him; and in addition to this he forgets all the horrible parts of the Bible and only looks at the good that is in it and takes all the bad as symbolical, he can get a great amount of pleasure out of life in this way.

The old saying is, "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise," and I sometimes think it is about so. I used to have lots of good times before I investigated liberalism. I am alone a great part of the time, with only my thoughts for companions, and I can assure you they are poor companions a good part of the time. If I could be in a position where I could mingle with kindred souls I should be happier. Some one put this motto over his library door, "When I am alone then I am least alone." That is true to a certain extent, but I long for a congenial companion to whom I can open my heart and find sympathy and encouragement, some one who will take interest enough in me to tell me my faults, and if they see anything worthy of praise will give me the pleasure of letting me know it. You have done this for me for some time, and I think I appreciate it. I should like to hear from you when you feel like writing. I hope you will take this in the same spirit in which it is written.

Ever yours, JOHN.

MY DEAR FRIEND: Yours just received. Of course I am not angry with you for what you write. It shows only that you have not embraced nor understood the principles of liberty. Free love means freedom in love, and I have not learned its meaning truly if I would interfere with the free expression of love of anyone.

Your description or statement of what you consider free love to be, is only free monogamy or free marriage. Probably the two you mention will "live together as long as they satisfy each other, and when they do not love they will separate." That is your definition of free love and is exactly what they will do. The difference between free lovers and yourself is that they know from the experience of the world that there is likely to be an end to the attraction some time, and so do not get into such a condition that when that time comes, there will be a thousand things to prevent their separating.

A prostitute is one who has sexual relations for money or for considerations other than love. So how can you say that a woman who has relations of that nature for nothing but love is a prostitute? Should she meet a man of fortune and marry him thinking she could merely like him, and thereby provide for herself, she would be a prostitute. Your analysis of the case would characterize as a prostitute any woman you professed to love outside of marriage, but you would excuse her on account of your being a prostitute perpetually through a mistake of your youth.

It is the church that says a woman must "increase and multiply" whether she wants to or not. A married woman puts herself in that place and increases and multiplies not only children, but misery and trouble for herself and children and husband. It is natural for a woman to want children, it is also natural to want them well provided for, and a woman is foolish and unjust to herself and to her child if she has children before she has means of support for them, even though she is married.

In freedom no woman wants a child until she can support it without the necessity of living with a man. And she knows that if there are no children, or if she has children that she is able to support "Whenever the time came that they do not love each other they will separate."

You have tried to find a means of prevention of conception for married folks. Were these persons you want the contracept for "obliged" on account of free love "to violate the laws of nature which says to the women 'increase and multiply'?" Why were you less concerned about their "running the risk of permanently injuring their health" than you are of women outside of wedlock? What is there in the marriage ceremony that makes sexual intercourse, whether desired or not, with a contracept not dangerous—when the temperate intercourse desired, with a contracept, is so dangerous when there is no ceremony?

"Of course it is a pleasant thing for him because he can leave her just as soon as he wants to." True. And it is equally well for her, because she can leave him "just as soon as she wants to." You still cling to the idea that a woman is the sufferer necessarily. Let me tell you that in freedom it is not so. My observation and experience show that a man is as often left to suffer as a woman. Your saying, "How will it be when she gets older and not so attractive?" is exasperating. Why, my dear friend, he is much older than she. How will it be for him when he gets older and not so attractive? She is much more likely to find a younger man nearer her own age that is attractive to her than he is to find a woman of his age who is as attractive in appearance as she is, and younger women are not likely to be attracted to him. You put men on a very inferior plane when you talk about a woman being left out of consideration because she is older. Why should she be, any more than men? You are talking of men who want handsome mistresses, not men of free minds who want mental comfort and companionship.

The fundamental principle of freedom is financial independence, and no free woman will sit around waiting for some male prostitute to come and pick her out and support her for her appearance. If no man admires her for her worth she will not have a lover, and she will go along about her work doing her legitimate work and not fret about it even as much as our maiden teachers, editors and workers in all lines do now.

Poor Clara Barton! Desolate and scorned Frances Willard! They might perhaps have had board and clothes furnished them in return for gratifying man's sexual appetites, and also been mothers to a dozen undesired children had they been "pretty and attractive." The woman you write about is young, yet she is self-supporting, with wages constantly increasing. It is your conventional girls, brought up to be prostitutes, brought up to depend upon father or husband for support on account of their being females, who must fret about growing old and unattractive and having no other means of support. If you educate your daughter to think she must depend on youth and beauty for love or support she had better be dead—and I do not wonder you feel so.

Love is the luxury of life, and I believe for myself in enjoying it whenever I can. Consequently I would not advise young persons to abstain from social happiness. I believe in controlling the expression of love to the extent that there shall not be years of agony to pay for it. I believe in eating fruit, but each one must learn to abstain at times that to him it is injurious. There is nothing but lack of money to keep free women from having all the children they desire. And I cannot see why a free woman should abstain from sexual pleasure, neither do I see why she should not control the number of children she shall bear. We think it commendable in married women to have no more children than they can properly care for.

You do not grasp the principle of Freedom in any line. You cling to conventionality and still want the benefits of freedom. You cling to God and to freedom. You grasp one side with the right hand and the other with the left, and there you hang. You have not let go of either side and while you hang suspended you only wear out your life fretting. Why not let go of the liberal side, and go back to your church and marriage idols? They need you. Your going back would give conservatives great joy and make them have a chance to say, "See how wretched free thought makes a man. See how glad he is to come back." As long as you can be caught and amused with such chaff as the paragraph you quote I see no hope of your ever being at home in liberal thought. I do not see a particle of chance for a man out of the church (and I would seriously advise the Catholic church) who can seriously quote, "No philosophy, no belief, no trust, no hope, either in this world or the next." If you have been all these years studying and think a freethinker has "no philosophy, no belief, no hope, no trust," your case is entirely hopeless. There is no comfort for you outside of a promise of rest in the arms of Jesus in the future.

If "When ignorance is bliss" is true, you should at once advocate closing the schools, as there is no place to limit the spread of knowledge. It must be stopped at the foundation, and man must not learn the alphabet if he is to be kept ignorant. Your thoughts are so illogical I do not wonder you are lonely when you have no other company.

There is congenial society and plenty for the person who has the courage to take it. For the person who is afraid of his neighbors, afraid of the church, afraid of his family, the only consistent thing for him is to shut out everybody he likes and spend his life with those he fears. I judge this is so from what I see of the lives of those who try to hold to both sides.

To the man who has faith in nature and in freedom there is to be found society in nature and in freedom, but no man can serve both law and freedom. "There is no stopping place between Rome and Reason," and there is no road from Rome to Reason that is not free to all the world if they have the courage to travel it. If you have not the courage cuddle down at Rome with the church for bed, the Pope to guard it, and Jesus to rescue at last.

I am glad I have been a desirable friend to you and hope to continue to be so. You must take this letter in the same spirit in which I write it, and in which you wished me take yours.

Ever your friend, AGNES.

The Practicability of Free Marriage.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

The first element in the introduction of a reform is the public recognition of its desirability. If it is desirable but impracticable, we can make it practicable. If free marriage is prevented by statute law, the law will be changed as soon as the public desire the change. If prevented by the courts under "rules of law," by which I mean American law and not the law laid down in English encyclopedias, then the rules of law must be changed, which can be done at any time by judges appreciating the necessity for the change. But in order that the judges may have the opportunity to make the decision which will change the practice of the courts, individual cases must arise involving the principle of free marriage for their adjudication. Even if a special contract should be adjudged invalid, in an individual case, it will aid in the education of the court and of the people towards the point of reform.

A contract may be set aside by the courts as contra bonos mores, contrary to good morals. Usually this applies to contracts to violate statute laws; but the judge considering a provision in a contract for marriage contrary to good morals, might feel it his duty as well as his privilege to set it aside. Good morals are what the conscience of the people, either naturally or by education, approves. If the education has been wrong, enlightenment will correct it, and bring the standard of good morals into conformity with natural law.

To correct a misprint allow me to repeat my definition:

By free marriage I mean a voluntary agreement between a man and a woman by which they shall secure their mutual and individual rights and the rights of their children.

When Will They Awake?

Morris Rosenfeld's "Songs from the Ghetto."

When everything is quiet all around, as silent as if dead, and there is no rustle, no sound, no stir—in the depth of night as if by magic, she appears before me.

A beautiful blonde woman, her body is as white as snow, but pale her cheeks are, pale; her strong shoulders are clearly defined and adorned with golden hair, but wet her eyes are, wet.

She looks at me and is silent, she raises her hands and points with them: A chain hangs down from her; I am sure, I understand her meaning, and finally, in tears, she asks, "Untie me!"

My heart is burning, and I rush with rapid steps and seize the chain. Alas, I fall back—a serpent long and thin is twined about it.

I cry, I call, I chide, but terrible is their sleep. I hear but snoring. "Rise, oh, rise quickly, and let there be light! Come, make liberty free!"

There is a silence. Only I alone exert myself, but as soon could I wake stones. No one moves from the spot; whether I call them or not, not a foot is raised—there is no end, no cessation (to her suffering).

But who can see the picture and not grow wild? Let there be an end, an end! I throw myself into the danger, and I hear a voice: "Senseless fool!" and I awake from my sleep.

A Dollar Book for Fifty Cents.

DEAR LUCIFER READERS: I have made the blessed Light Bearer a New Year's present of fifteen "Irenes,', which they will sell for half price, and as the book is a handsome ornament for any parlor table, I feel sure that there are at least fifteen of Lucifer's readers who will purchase as soon as they read this, as it will be a good holiday present for any one to give a friend whom they wish to show the truthful status of woman in the present social institutions. You can tell your friends that the scenes therein are taken from real life. The District Attorney of Philadelphia called it an "awful book" when he threatened to imprison me if I did not give up the plates and books to be burned by the "Vice Society." Yes, it is awful, but it would have been awfuller had I put in the worst stories that have been revealed to me!

But the sad part is made easier by the humorous. The humorous character, "Nan," is a perfect description of a pupil of mine away out on the western prairies. The most remarkable character, Mme. Leroy, whose secret life was unfolded to me in confidence, was an efficient member of a respectable church, and with the exception of that illegitimate and bidden business she was one of the noblest women. Thus does Irene show how important is the work of our noble Lucifer, which is to make people honest and free. Many of my friends are now re-reading the book because it shows so plainly that true love alone should guide in the most sacred of all relations, and also because it is a true history of the progress of reformatory movements. In hope,

Yours for all truth, SADA BAILEY FOWLER.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

THE NAME LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE CHICAGO SECULAR UNION has been re-organized under the name of the Illinois Agnostic Society. Meetings will be held in the office of Dr. Greer, 52 Dearborn street, the last two Saturday evenings in '98. Beginning with the first Sunday in '99, the meetings will be held every Sunday evening at the same place.

Somewhat Personal

The habit of parading one's own personality, one's own personal affairs, to the public eye, is certainly not a commendable one, and yet there may be occasions when the free use of the pronoun "I" may be admissible, if not absolutely necessary. The present seems to be one of these occasions.

In recent issues of Lucifer something has been said in regard to a winter vacation for the editor, who has been on the invalid list since the early part of October last. Until within the past few days the ways and means to such a vacation did not seem to materialize. The receipt of the following letter, with a few more of like import, have materially altered the outlook:

"MR. M. HARMAN, 1394 Congress St., Chicago, Ill.: I have just finished with Lucifer of the 10th inst. I note that you need a change and a rest. Please to use the enclosed for that purpose. A radical change—higher and dryer air and more of sunshine than Chicago offers, would, I believe, help you. I would leave Lucifer way behind and not worry during absence. A child of eighteen should and does have some vitality of its own.

Very truly, C. A. S."

December 16, 98.

This letter bears internal evidence that its author intended that neither the name, nor the amount of inclosed check should be published. Another brief, but significant note received about the same time, reads as follows:

"DEAR MOSES HARMAN: Please apply the enclosed check to the sole purpose of getting away from your office for a little while. If you do not return it I shall consider you keeping it to be an implied promise that you will go off for a vacation. Don't forget the tonic! A joyous holiday to you!

ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN."

Another, writing from the same city as the last, says:

"Inclosed find five dollars towards taking a rest. W. B.—December 14."

From several other persons, sums ranging from twenty-five cents to five dollars, for the purpose indicated above, have been received. Among these kind donors I think it not amiss to mention the names of Mrs. H. M. Lyndall, Sarah Stone Rockhill, B. W. Rodes and Frank Griffin. These are not all. A few prefer that no mention whatever be made of what they do to help Lucifer by helping its old editor to take a rest.

The aggregate of these checks, bills and postoffice stamps will go a good way towards making the conditions under which I now think it proper and right to absent myself for a few weeks from the work in Lucifer's office. As to how long I shall remain away, and how far I shall go, it will depend mainly upon the news I may get, from time to time, from my co-operators in Lucifer's office. As to direction I propose to go southward—towards the Gulf States, hoping to get out for awhile from the influence of the great northern lakes. I shall expect to make no long journeys, and shall be glad to meet as many of Lucifer's friends and readers as possible. My first stop will probably be Bloomington, Ill.; then Roodhouse, Ill.; then St. Louis, Mo. From thence—if I go further—it will depend on the word I get from friends whether I go to Southwest Missouri, or Southern Kansas, or to Kentucky, to Tennessee, to Florida, or to Louisiana, Mississippi, or to Alabama.

Once more, and while sincerely thanking all who have sent words of sympathy and of personal regard, and especially all who have contributed generously of their worldly means to make this journey possible, and also all who have in any way helped to make Lucifer and its work a triumphant success, I respectfully but earnestly ask a continuance of this fraternal co-operation with, and support of, the workers in office during my proposed absence therefrom.

M. HARMAN.

Enlargement of Lucifer and the "Free Propaganda."

In a recent number of the Light-Bearer several letters have been published touching upon the question of adding a few pages to the weekly issue. Other letters not published have urged the enlargement of the paper both as to space and as to range of subjects to be discussed. Prominent among these advocates of extension is William Scheme nour, of Waterville, Ohio, who offers to contribute five dollars towards defraying the expense of such enlargement, and now Mr. J. P. Lederer, of the same place, makes a like offer. Whether these good friends mean they will contribute five dollars per annum, or just a single five dollar bill, they do not say.

Of course all who know anything of the cost of getting out a weekly publication such as the Light Bearer, know that ten dollars would go but a little way toward paying the extra expense of adding four or eight pages, yet if any considerable portion of Lucifer's readers would contribute a like sum the number of pages could be doubled without adding to the price of yearly subscription.

Many things, pro and con may be said on this question of enlargement that cannot be said in this issue. Wishing to hear all sides before deciding the writer of these lines requests all who may take an interest in the matter to send us their views, their suggestions, briefly as possible, not necessarily for publication.

"THE FREE PROPAGANDA."

Before dismissing the subject of enlargement for this time, however, it seems timely and pertinent to say a few words anent the organization called the "Free Propaganda," the first report of which was published in Lucifer of last week, and concerning which report some comment was promised. This organization, if I understand its animus and scope, is neither more nor less than an effort to enlarge or extend Lucifer's work, and as such I have given to it all the encouragement in my power, except it be to fix my name to the list of members. For reasons that to me seemed sufficient I have not done this, but have freely given to Mr. Walker the use of Lucifer's columns and the use of its subscription list through which to advocate the claims of said organization. Hitherto I have abstained from expressing an opinion as to methods in this department of Lucifer's work, chiefly because, judging from all past experience, I knew my motives in criticizing the methods of my fellow workers would be construed to my disadvantage. "In things essential, unity; in things non-essential, diversity; in all things charity," [love]—is a good motto.

Hence I have held my peace, and would probably continue to do so were it not that the question of enlargement of Lucifer has again come up for consideration. Even now I shall offer no criticism, as such, but will content myself with asking a few questions:

While, on general principles, "Division of labor" is a good thing, might it not be best—in times like these, when orthodoxies of all kinds, with their right-bower, money, are combined against us—might it not be the part of wisdom to remember the motto, "The secret of success is concentration?"

In other words, is it best to maintain two independent centers of propaganda work, when the objects are identical?

If New York is the better center for publication and distribution of literature in Lucifer's line, would it not be better to move the western plant and consolidate it with the eastern?

Hoping that these brief queries or suggestions will be considered in the same kindly and fraternal spirit in which they are made I will say no more for this time.

Self-Control in Expression.

BY M. FLORENCE JOHNSON.

Giotto says in Lucifer No. 741: "Self-control . . has come to mean the control of the physical over the spiritual." This is true, and her idea has prompted me to give my observations on this subject. Self-control as usually understood, means suppression. If I have trouble and hide it from my friends, it is self-control. If I feel elated at good news and keep on in my usual humdrum way, it is self-control. This is all very true. A person who could not control expression, to hide away undesirable emotion would be deficient in self-control. Now take the other side. Suppose I desire to show that I appreciate a thing and I cannot express it, I am deficient in self-control. I see a man or woman suffering from some physical or mental torture, words and voice fail to portray my thoughts and emotions, simply because I cannot control myself to do it. More persons have the ability to express censure of what they disapprove than have the education to express praise for what they approve.

We find the education of life has been to control in the direction of death, and neglected in the direction of life. We have learned to express the emotion which leads to unhappiness, but as a rule, we have not learned the one which leads to joy. The world will allow us to say "I hate" such a person, no matter if we are almost alone in that opinion; it will not allow us uncensured to express as freely, love for another, unless all society agrees that the love is approved. Yet the hatred might work untold misery, while the love would help the loved one and injure no one. Self-control must be cultivated on the side of expression as well as repression. When we learn to be as much ashamed when we fail to express our feelings as we now are if we fail to hide them there will be marked improvement in our social behavior.

Physical self-control means the ability to sit calmly when we choose, it also means the ability to run, and in everything it is the same. One-half is to be able to not do, the best half is to be able to do.

The Bedborough Case.

BY R. B. KERR.

It has often been remarked that one must always allow for the personal equation. It is equally important, although rather difficult, to allow for the national equation. There are certain important national distinctions which both Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Walker have overlooked in writing about the above subject.

1. An undramatic compromise is a characteristically English way of getting out of difficulties. Senator Hoar gave a good example of this a few months ago in one of the Reviews. He pointed out that for four hundred years there has been a doubt as to whether or not the Judge who holds the Assizes at Oxford is or is not entitled to occupy the house of a certain professor during the sittings of the court. In America such a question would quickly be settled in court. In England it is different. When the Judge arrives at Oxford he drives toward the Professor's house. Some distance from the house he is met by an emissary of the Professor, who gives him a polite invitation to stay at his house during the Assize. The Judge on his part sends on a messenger to give the Professor orders to have his house ready on his arrival. When the Judge arrives the Professor comes out to meet him and welcomes him as a guest, hoping that he will make himself at home during his stay. The Judge in turn asks the Professor to stay with him as a guest, and hopes he will make himself extremely comfortable. Thus it has gone on for four hundred years. Nobody knows what the rights of the matter are, and nobody cares. When a bill is introduced in the British House of Commons no one is so impolite as to move that it be rejected, but somebody moves that it be read this day six months. In the same way, when prosecutor and prosecution have both had enough of a case, they make an amicable little agreement. The accused person pleads guilty, gets a few words of grandmotherly advice from the bench, binds himself over to come up for sentence if ever called upon, and walks out of the court a free man. I once settled a man's case with the government in exactly the same way, and I know as well what was said and done in regard to Bedborough's compromise as if I had been there myself.

2. In America it is probably best to fight a case like Bedborough's to a finish, because these prosecutions are becoming so frequent that they must be stopped. Within one year Ruedebusch, Pope and Berrier have all been prosecuted, and one of them got two years' imprisonment. There is no parallel to this in England. Such prosecutions occur only at rare intervals over there, and the quietest way to settle them is probably the most effectual. I can only recollect three prosecutions in England altogether which can be compared with the three in America within the past year. The Bradlaugh-Besant case fizzled out in 1877, the parties being convicted and then let off on a technicality. In 1890 Vizitelly was convicted for selling obscene literature, not connected in any way with the scientific discussion of the sex question. He got a few months imprisonment. In 1898 the Bedborough case has come up, and the prosecution has been glad to compromise. The net result is that the press appears to be in very little danger, and does not seem to stand much in need of martyrs.

3. In America it is very important that the few who are interested in liberty should fight very hard for it, because the general public opinion of the country is extremely sluggish, except when the prosecution is in some foreign country. Bryce calls this sluggishness the "fatalism of the American people." It is probably chiefly due to the system of government. In America the executive is elected for four years, and no power on earth can get it out before that time. Consequently there is tremendous excitement for a few weeks before the election, and then the people go to sleep for four years. But under the parliamentary government of England and France the government must make a never-ending fight for office. If it loses one division in parliament it has to resign. Both the government and the people are always on the qui vive. Public opinion never goes to sleep and the government is always desperately afraid of offending it. As Lord Salisbury truly remarked some months ago, "Public opinion is now the government in England. There is no power which can make any serious resistance to it any more than there is in France.

4. Public opinion being the government in England, and the only tribunal of any importance, Bedborough's case was settled months ago. When the editors of the Fortnightly and Saturday "Reviews" joined the Free Press Defense Committee, and Stead wrote his article on the subject, the future of free discussion of sexual inversion was decided. Nothing was left but to patch up the case quietly and drop it. From now on the press of England will be as free on that subject as it has been for twenty years on the subject of contracepts.

The pessimism of Mr. Foote as to the future has deceived Mr. Walker. If an American said there was anything wrong with the institutions of his country, then indeed the crisis must be a grave one. But the English are always talking ruin and desolation, as Herbert Spencer and many others have pointed out. Those who are interested in foreign affairs are always complaining that all the other nations are dividing the world among them, while John Bull never gets anything. Merchants complain every day that all other nations are cutting the British out, and that Great Britain has hardly any foreign trade left. It is the nature of the beast to grumble. Those who understand the national character will regard Mr. Foote's doleful predictions as conclusive proof that the future of the British is absolutely safe.

The personal aspects of the case matter little, but I must say that I consider Bedborough did wrongly in making a settlement without first consulting his committee. Moreover, I do not think he sufficiently appreciated the tremendous fight which was made in his behalf. If he did not get enough sympathy and support, what shall we say of any other man who was ever prosecuted for a like offense?

The Marriage Formula.

BY DORA F. KERR.

In connection with the discussion on the word "obey" in the marriage ceremony of the English and American church, it is interesting to note the original words of the formula, which the clergymen in their symposium, apparently do not mention. In one of the liturgies on which the present liturgy, the prayer book of Edward the Sixth was based, the obedience promise of the woman appears as "to be buxom (i. e. bowsome, obedient) in bed and board." Evidently the compilers of the Sarum Use and other mediæval liturgies had an eye to substantial comforts and would not have been content with the spiritual meaning of obedience which modern clergymen claim for it.

The English secular marriage form does not contain any obedience vow. The American secular form copies the ecclesiastical wording, including the word "obey"; and so far I agree with my friend, the Rev. Dr. deCosta, that it is servile; but the offensive word can be omitted on protest.

"THE FREETHOUGHT IDEAL" has passed into the hands of Etta Semple and Laura Knox, who publish it at Ottawa, Kas. It is a bright little paper about the size of Lucifer and is published fortnightly at 50 cents a year. Mrs. Semple was a candidate for State Superintendent of Instruction in Kansas last election, and though she was defeated, she made a better showing than the others on her ticket. Her principal fight is for the Constitutional Rights which shall guarantee equal liberty of conscience for all, and equal taxation of all properties, that owned by the church included. Lucifer is glad to extend the right hand of fellowship to "The Freethought Ideal" and to its editors and publishers, both of whom have been in the past faithful and efficient helpers of Lucifer and its work. It is sincerely to be hoped that the freethinking public, and especially the freethinkers of Kansas, will see to it that "The Freethought Ideal" is not allowed to die, nor to become a burden upon the hands of the editors and publishers.

Notice.

Some friends of Emma Goldman, remembering the success of her last lecturing tour to the West, have received her consent to make arrangements for lectures at intermediate points—the lecturer to start from New York the latter part of next January. Comrades desiring further information will write to Emma Goldman, 50 First street, New York.

It has also been deemed advisable to start a fund to cover the traveling expenses, and those wishing to assist may do so by sending their contributions.

Miss Goldman's subjects are:

"Sex Problems."

"The Power of the Idea."

"Theory and Practice. A Criticism on Ethics."

"Politics and its Corrupting Influence on Man."

"Trades-Unionism; What it is, and What It Could Be."

Meetings have been arranged in Barre, Vt., Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and the mining districts of Western Pennsylvania, Chicago, St. Louis and other places. Those desiring lectures by Miss Goldman should communicate with her as soon as possible.

Holiday Presents.

The annual winter holidays are at hand and, with them, the time-honored custom of making gifts to friends now returns and demands recognition. The festival season or time of merry-making called Christmas, "Christmas-tide," is of very ancient origin, much older than the beginning of the so-called Christian era.

In all countries of the North Temperate and North Frigid zones there would seem to be substantial reasons for making this a time of rejoicing and giving of gifts. At this time the old year seems to die, and the new year to be born. Midwinter is a season of enjoyment, of repose and rest from the labors of the old year; hence the very natural desire to increase one's own enjoyment by making others happy, and thus, doubtless, arose the ages-old custom of making Christmas and New Year's presents.

Many of the readers and patrons of the Lightbringer will doubtless observe this ancient and honorable custom, as far as their means will permit. In making presents it is often difficult to decide what to choose—whether to select an article of permanent value or one that quickly perishes in the using. Among the gifts that combine beauty and use, and that may be kept as a souvenir for many years, there is nothing that surpasses a good book—a book whose matter will have an educating, a refining, an ennobling, a happifying influence on the mind of the reader.

In this book-making age the readers of Lucifer will not lack for offers of desirable books from which to choose presents for friends, young or of maturer age. These readers do not need to be reminded that the publishing house located at 1394 West Congress street, Chicago, is a competitor for their patronage, and respectfully asks a share of their winter book trade.

Among the books we offer and recommend as suitable for holiday presents are:

(1). "First Principles," by Herbert Spencer; with appendix and copious index of subjects, 508 pages, same style of binding, type, etc., with "Data of Ethics"; price fifty cents; postage, 13c.

(4). "Perfect Motherhood, or Mabel Raymond's Resolve," by Lois Waisbrooker; 345 pages, well bound in cloth, with portrait of the author; price, $1.

(5). "The Flaming Meteor," Poetical works of Will Hubbard-Kernan; with portrait of the author and life-sketch; 270 pages, very tastefully and substantially bound in cloth; price, $1.

(6). "Dreams," by Olive Schreiner, to which are added "Evangeline, and other poems by Longfellow; tastefully and artistically bound in cloth; 191 pages; price thirty cents.

(7). "Karezza. Ethics of Marriage," by Dr. Alice B. Stockham; 136 pages, flexible cloth; price $1.

These are a few only of the books published or sold by us that we think very suitable for holiday presents. For fuller list please write us for catalogues.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Well knowing how hard it is to get a dollar of the "money of the realm," which means the money of the banker, and of the privileged classes generally, we hereby make this additional or supplementary offer:

For every dollar sent us at one time for books we will send free, twenty-five cents' worth of our pamphlet literature, including the seven numbers of "Our New Humanity," and all other pamphlets issued by us that are not now out of print, together with many others that have been, from time to time, advertised and sold by our publishing house. This offer does not include postage. Some of the books are large for the price; hence to avoid loss we ask that postage be sent with orders for free literature.

Asking for liberal co-operation in what we believe to be the "hope of the world," namely, the cultivation and development of higher and better ideas and ideals, we, of the Light Bearer office herewith and once more send forth to our friends and helpers, the world round, our

MERRY CHRISTMAS AND HAPPY NEW YEAR!

VARIOUS VOICES.

Peter M. Gideon, Excelsior, Minn.—Enclosed I send two dollars for books. Sorry to learn that your health is failing. Hope you will revive and continue the work to which you have been devoting your time and strength for so long. You are on the only road that leads to true and lasting reform. To better the world we must grow a better class of people, and better people can be grown only when mothers are free. The hell-dens of the present—homes where motherhood is enforced—are growing young devils by the million. Set aside the marriage and divorce laws and these hell-dens, with their broods of young devils will vanish. Then the Christian wind-blowers will find their occupation gone—no sins nor sinners to thunder against. Then they will of necessity be compelled to go to work to earn their bread and butter, instead of fattening, as they do now, on the ignorance of their dupes—born and bred such in earth-hells.

G. C. Bolton, Pawnee, Okla.—Find enclosed money order [$5], for which send books named below, including one dollar for "Hilda's Home" when ready, and one dollar on subscription to Lucifer. I have wanted to send money for books for a long time, but this is the first time I have had it to send. I am sincerely enlisted in the cause for which Lucifer is battling, and will do all in my power to further its best interest. Would like to join some band of radical people in building up a co-operative home, as I am tired of the individual struggle under the present system. I have some means that I would use in combination with others, but I want to join hands with liberty-loving people who are broad-minded enough to grant that every man and woman has the right to do as they please so long as they do not transgress the rights of others. Would like to correspond with parties who are thinking of organizing, or who have already a colony of radicals organized and in operation. If you know of any such please inform me where to find it. Hoping this small sum will do much good for you and the cause of humanity, I am a true friend of Lucifer and its band of noble workers.

Albina L. Washburn, 785 Lincoln ave., Denver, Colo.—If found a wonderful advance in thought in Denver in the past three years since I spent a summer in house to house canvassing and speaking before various societies on Co-operative Exchange. It is much easier now to find people who agree with liberal thought. Especially do we find mental science advocates in most homes, not only among the well-to-do but with those who those who are working hard for a living in the face of all the difficulties imposed by the banker, the usurer and the petty laws framed to wring from the industrious a support for the idle. They are believing or enquiring or doubting, and doubting is next door to conversion. Hard headed, self-satisfied bigotry is the most discouraging condition of the human mind.

Far-sighted women now find the ballot of little use, since money so evidently overrules the vote that money can "go it alone" without the people. However, the development and self-culture, the independence and self-respect that have come to women through their long struggle for "equality before the law" have been of inestimable value to the race. Women's clubs with their manifold branches reaching into every department of study, philanthrophy and business, are bringing to the root the woman'y element, and in corresponding ratio are retiring the prevalent masculine influence now so persistently used for money making, selfish scheming and physical pleasure. Womanhood is most unmistakably taking on the positive, and her long negative subjection is daily becoming less. Do we not see the customs of Venus coming into vogue, where the men remain in the home attending to the babies and other household duties while the women form the legislature, directing and executing public demands? There is this difference, however; women are learning that the law is a farce, and that the law-abiding citizen who does not use the law for his own advancement is quite out of date. Government of man by man is still endured by the ignorant, but government of women by men is, in Colorado at least, fast becoming an impossibility.

Enclosed find list of names for sample copies. I believe the public mind is ready for another step in evolution. A mental and spiritual element is predominant, especially among the women. There are a great number of the latter who have been deserted by, or have quietly left inferior husbands, and are now cheerfully and industriously making their own way.

William Holmes is here working in co-operative movements. The latest is the communist colony of C. M. Pruden, Marshall, Boulder county. Mr. Holmes and George Taylor, of Pittsburg, are working up the plan. They informed me yesterday that the checks of the Labor Exchange here, lately closed, will be redeemed in cash in the near future. Their office is 504 Charles Block, Curtis and 15th street. As for my plan—"Co-operative Exchange" it still hangs suspended in the air, a mist perhaps, so all-pervading, but let us hope the next cold wave will condense and precipitate it in practical form among the people.

DON'T NEGLECT THE OPPORTUNITY

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

Do these figures correspond with the number printed on the wrapper of your Lucifer? If so your subscription expires with this number. Please renew for another year.

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce." R. G. WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

PERSONAL A well-educated, broad minded, liberal lady, neat in person, well preserved, not far from seventy years young—alone in the world, living in an orthodox village, wishes to correspond with single gentlemen, healthy, liberal, of excellent habits, neither poor nor rich, of about the same age. The years do not make us old so much as our thoughts. With good, clean habits and sound heredity the limit of life should not be under 85 or 90. Willing to go to any of Uncle Sam's new possessions to begin life and grow up with the country. All first letters may be directed to "M." care of Lucifer,

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" reputed criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 15 cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. II., No. 52. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, DECEMBER 31, E. M. 298. [C. E. 1898.] WHOLE No. 743.

A Rhyme of Thomas the Doubter.

Then the Master had finished the story of the sower and the seed,
And had shown his disciples the lesson of rock and wayside and weed,

Then up spake Thomas the Doubter, and his brow was furrowed with thought—
He had seen a darker problem in the lesson that was taught,

"Master," said Thomas the Doubter, "when the seed sown is the word
I can see the meaning quite plainly of the lesson we have heard.

"But Master, say that the sower were God and the seed were men
And some of them fell by the wayside, what were the lessons then?

"For I see men daily, my brothers, like the seed of which you spoke,
And among the thorns fall many, and the thorns spring up and choke.

"And some of them, good Master, fall where the soil is scant,
And they perish there for the absence of the life for which they pant.

"It is easy," said Thomas the Doubter, "for those on good soil cast,
For they have their joy of living and the harvest at the last:

"But those who fall by the wayside, in thorns and on stony ground,
Are they like the seed-grain scattered by a careless hand around?"

But the Master was silent and mournful, and his brow was furrowed with thought,
And there lay on his soul a burden which Thomas the Doubter had wrought.

England and the English.

BY D. N. SWIFT.

Mr. Chamberlain's excellent statement of the Bedborough case admirably explains the exact position in which English literary freedom stands since the collapse of what at one time looked like an adamantine police wall against progress. It will be a long time before our English Comstocks attempt a second encounter. It is a singular fact that a prosecution of this type helps reform more than many years of solid labor ever do. The decision of Mr. Bedborough not to go to prison when his liberty was offered to him on terms had at least one positive and one negative advantage to the cause he has served in the past. A legal defense based chiefly on technicalities (and it is hardly to be supposed that any other defense would have been attempted by paid lawyers acting under instructions from a committee opposed to Mr. Bedborough's particular views), would have served no purpose except the recovery of the prisoner's liberty.

Most of the committee had been aware from the first that the main line of defense would have been the technical proof that the accused was neither the author, printer nor publisher of the publications to selling which he pleaded guilty. Nine tenths of the trial would have been devoted to the (from a legal point of view) very proper point of showing that Dr. DeVilliers, the actual publisher, had been allowed to emigrate, while Mr. Bedborough was arrested. The remainder of the defense would probably have tended to prove that the sale of the book had been most restricted in extent, and that it had only been sold to physicians and really clever students of science like Mr. Sweeney. How degrading all such apologies would have been from the point of view of freedom! George Bedborough preferred to promise never to sell any more of the books rather than to apologize for his action; to say "guilty" and let the past speak for itself rather than to explain away the past as being "really quite orthodox when you come to see what was actually intended."

The negative advantage gained by Bedborough was that undoubtedly the rejection of the suggested compromise would have brought out far fiercer antagonism than before, and the English friends of freedom are far too few and too young to face at present the fighting of such a battle. Bedborough probably considered that his martyrdom would have gained nothing for his cause inside the court, while outside the court he clearly gained eight counts out of the total eleven, and the eight counts on which he secured an acquittal were the entire issue of "The Adult" for which he as editor and publisher was responsible. Anyone who reads the extraordinary speech of the Judge, Sir Charles Hall, is bound to agree at any rate, that Bedborough's calculations as to comparative gain, were perfectly justified by events.

A few words as to Mr. Walker's cheery optimism about my country. "This is the first collapse," he seems to believe, "in the defensive struggle." It is most certainly not the first time a man in England has pleaded guilty when he was not guilty of the descriptive epithets included in his indictment. I am always glad to read Mr. Walker's views of English pioneers. In England whenever we want to emphasize our discontent with our fellow radicals we always speak of the Pilgrim Fathers, or the Chicago martyrs, or Bennett, Harman—and, will he believe it, modest man—E. C. Walker. In England we have had brave men, cowards, fanatics, fools, and average men—just about the same miscellaneous sort as is raised in America. Mr Walker must not forget that although Charles Bradlaugh published and sold "The Fruits of Philosophy"—the subject of the famous battle—the same man moved the legal heaven and earth, wisely and well, to escape having to defend "The Freethinker," although he was at the first included in the indictment against that paper. His position in that matter was not that he disagreed with "The Freethinker," but that he was not the publisher and he declined to take its publisher's legal responsibilities.

Mr. Henry Seymour (whose curious personal abuse of Mr. Bedborough makes such interesting reading in "The Adult") pleaded guilty a few years ago to the indictment of blasphemy for which he was tried at Maidstone Assizes. Henry Vizitelly, in 1889, pleaded guilty to publishing Zola's "La Terre" in English. In neither of the two last-named cases were any particular benefits gained to the cause of freedom except that Seymour, a capable worker in many good causes, saved himself the unnecessary risk to health and life, while poor Vizitelly, who could have made a brilliant defense (had there been any means of confining the prosecution to evidence pertinent to the particular book indicted), received a sentence of twelve months hard labor, which in his case proved a death sentence. Mr. Vizitelly was a man of great literary ability and repute. He co unded that pioneer of pictorial journalism, "The Illustrated

London News." He introduced to the British public the works of Longfellow, Poe, Mrs. Beecher Stowe, Tolstoi and Dostoieffsky, Thackery, Dickens, Gustave Dore, Birket Foster and very many other famous authors and artists were among his contributors and co-workers. The mere catalogue of his publications arouses at this day a pang of envy among book lovers. And this man at the age of seventy-four pleaded guilty to a charge of "obscenity," to "corrupting the morals of her Majesty's subjects," to being "a man of depraved mind," etc., after a long life of active work for the enlargement of his fellow citizens' knowledge. His out-of-office hobby was work for the public good. Henry Vizitelly was for many years Honorary Secretary to the Association for the Repeal of the Paper Duty. The celebrated action against him for issuing the "Illustrated Times" without a stamp, decided the fate of the newspaper stamp. He was fined several thousands of pounds, but the abolition of the stamp immediately followed.

American readers must remember that in England a man may fight any act of Parliament except the law against obscenty, and his prosecution will deal solely with the evidence as to his guilt. There is no law, however, in England, against selling or publishing an obscene book. The statutory offense is that "A. B. is a person of depraved mind," and sold "an obscene book with intent to corrupt the morals." Accordingly all his private life in its most intimate relationships is laid bare, and as we saw in the Bedborough case, even an alleged discovery of "indecent" photographs which even the prosecution did not suggest were ever sold to a living soul, played a part in the case against Dr. Ellis's book. Mr. Vizetelly is said to have had some little private skeleton in his family cupboard which he preferred to die rather than reveal, although it had nothing whatever to do directly with himself or Zola's book.

One of the first necessities in English reform progress is the concentration of forces against the legal procedure which allows as evidence in a case of this kind statements which would be properly ruled out of court in any other proceedings against the same man.

The Etiology and Treatment of Criminality.

Dansal R. Brower, A. M., M. D., "Medico Legal Journal."

The principal etiological factors in crime are vicious parentage, bad environment, intemperance, a constant increase in the urban population, unrestricted immigration, and the unreasonable manner in which the laws are administered.

Vicious parentage not only means a criminal parentage, but a neurotic one, the product of epilepsy, hysteria, alcohol and narcotic poisons, or any of the other neurotic conditions that transmit to posterity an unstable, irritable nervous system; or any condition that in its transmission diminishes the power of inhibition. There is often among criminals a very great fecundity. This is well illustrated by the Juke family in New York, one criminal producing a progeny of about 1,700 criminals and paupers in the seventh generation.

Bad environment is a very important factor in the causation of crime. The child is father of the man, and only those who are endowed with extreme mental capacity, can raise themselves above the almost overwhelming influences of their environments. The world has produced very few Lincolns and Garfields.

Intemperance alcohol, is an etiological factor in crime. We recognize this as a strong anæsthetic, benumbing physical, as well as moral sensibility. Its striking effects when habitually used, are to make people untruthful, to increase sensuality. The habitual drunkard probably lies without being conscious of it, these qualities are transmitted, and in their transmission often become intensified. Dr. Wines, as the result of his extensive observations in prisons throughout the world, ascertained that fully three-fourths of all the prisoners have been addicted to the excessive use of alcoholic liquor. The distinguished Judge White of Pennsylvania, says after fifteen years on the bench, "I believe four-fifths of all crimes committed are the result directly or indirectly of intoxicating liquors."

The increase in the urban population, the tendency of civilization today to make people flock from countries to cities is remarkable all over the world, making as it does the struggle for existence so much more severe. It has been estimated that our city supplies ninety per cent of the criminals in our public institutions.

Unrestricted immigration is a very powerful etiological factor. The census of 1890 shows that the foreign element constitutes about twenty per cent of the whole population; and yet this foreign-born population furnishes over one-third of our criminals, and three fifths of our paupers. It looks very much as if the European countries were unloading on us their criminals and paupers.

The unreasonable manner in which the laws are administered serves as a factor in the development of criminals. When a child steals an article of small value he is sent to jail, and there he mingles daily with criminals who are greater adepts than himself and he learns from them lessons of crime that will make him more successful in his future ventures. If the stolen article is of small value the punishment is of short duration. When the time comes he goes out into the world free, not to engage in a profitable occupation of course, but to begin afresh his criminal operations. In due time he is again arrested, sent to the Bridewell, to jail or to the penitentiary. Before correcting his incapacity for useful occupation again, he associates with these confirmed criminals, serves out his sentence and is again released. Nothing has been done to give him capacity for earning his support. He is now disgraced in the eyes of the people, and the means of obtaining a livelihood are practically nil. Better versed in criminal knowledge, he now pursues his criminal propensities for probably a longer period of time, and then some time or other is re-arrested, so that there may be commitment after commitment. One case on record shows 230 commitments. This is unreasonable. The consideration in the main of the child's first committment should not have been the crime, but should have been the biological condition of the prisoner. The object should not be to punish altogether; it should be to restrain, to reform, it should be deterrent and reformatory rather than purely punitive.

Now, the remedy for the treatment of these people should be the modification of the marriage license. The vicious parentage should be avoided by demanding evidence that both the proposed contracting parties are in good health; that they are not alcoholic nor narcotic inebriates; that they have not epilepsy, tuberculosis, nor active venereal disease; that they are not insane, criminals, paupers. The breeder of horses, cows and pigs, has a most careful regard for matters of heredity and improves his stock by careful consideration of the use of all the knowledge he possesses on this subject. And surely, the future of the human race is as important as that of the domestic animals by which they are surrounded. Bad environments should be corrected by court proceedings. Children who are not receiving proper discipline and education at home should be placed under such suitable environments as will correct these errors and defects.

The temperance question is a vast one. Spreading information among the people as to the baneful influence of intemperance to the extent that it is now being done, will diminish crime and a more universal distribution of the knowledge of this sort will be followed by even more improvement. So long as king alcohol makes laws, so long as the saloon is the great factor in American politics, just so long will all our efforts at controlling this prolific cause of crime be failures. We need today legislation for drunkards; we need today authority to place in prolonged confinement the drunkard just as much as we need legislation for restraining the insane, and for the confinement of the criminal. By present methods the reformation of the drunkard is almost impossible; whereas, if we had authority to restrain them for one, two or three years, or just as long as the reformation is required, with the privilege of reapplying the confinement when necessary, there might be some reasonable probability of a fair amount of reformation. Probably the best way out of it today is not by prohibition, but by a high license system.

As a remedy for the constant increase in the urban population, which is such a fruitful source of crime, some method must be provided for the restoration of the equilibrium—some way by which the unproductive citizen may be transported to the country.

The last proposition—the unreasonable manner in which laws are administered—demands: First, that the pardoning power be taken out of the hands of the governors of states and placed under the control of a board of pardons, whose members should be skilled in criminal anthropology. Second, all sentences should be indeterminate, based upon the social and biological condition of the criminal. He should be under reformatory influence until his reformation is affected, be the offense great or small. Then our penal institutions demand remodeling. There should be local jails for the retention of prisoners awaiting trial in which there should be complete segregation. A man who has committed his first offense should not be permitted to associate with hardened criminals. Trial should be speedy, and sentences prompt.

For the incorrigible minor children there should be reform schools, where, through a protracted period, these children should be educated in manual training, and taught some useful occupation that may be to them a means of honorable livelihood. There should be reformatories for the older criminals who are capable of reformation; and these also should be taught, not only the rudiments of an English education, but the useful arts, and their period of confinement should be until they are able to withstand temptation and earn an honest living.

And lastly, for those who are incapable of reformation, there should be penitentiaries for their life-long incarceration, and these should be made as near self-sustaining as possible by having the prisoners employed in useful occupations.

Comments on the Lieutenant Wark Case.

BY KEAP.

"All this misery," which has resulted from the Lieutenant Wark case is not to be laid at the doors of "respectable society." Much of it properly belongs right where it fell the hardest—upon Lieutenant Wark and Miss Yates. Indirectly to the "respectable society" of which they were a part. Had Miss Yates been a self-poised, individualized woman, she would have known better than to have allowed herself to be placed in the condition she was when she did not want it. Had Lieutenant Wark been the man he poses himself as being in his remarks to the court, he would not have allowed "their mutual love" to place the object of that love in the position he did. What compensation was it to her that he was willing to "stand by her to the end"? or to "die in the arms of the man she loves"? He says himself that she placed "implicit trust in" him, and it is quite evident to any one knowing the facts as stated, that he shamefully betrayed that trust when he impregnated her. It was a poor time to attempt a restoration when she was dying from the effects of "their mutual love" and his betrayal of her "implicit trust" in him! "Throw her on one side" indeed! Such a man does not deserve hanging, but he is not fit to be running at large until after his methods of "sticking to" a girl he loved and betrayed are materially improved.

And what shall be said of the woman who permits herself to become impregnated under conditions which forbid the proper development of her child? Certainly she needs protection from herself as well as from others. From the moment of impregnation she is dependent more or less upon others for her comfort and welfare. Alone and of herself she can do nothing toward the development of the task she has undertaken. Owing to the necessary changes taking place in her system in the early months of her undertaking, she cannot be relied upon to take her usual place in life. As time goes on, she is still more under obligations to her fellow beings for the comfort and conveniences of life. She needs and should have, the very best care and protection for the successful development of the life within her body, and when the time of her delivery comes, she is still more the object of anxiety, of personal care and attention. Then follow the weeks of convalescence, the months of close attention as a mother, and it is at least five years from the time she has assumed the responsibility of motherhood before she can truly say that she is ready or capable of taking her place as an independent worker among her fellows. Has she a right to impose such responsibilities upon others without first consulting them and obtaining their consent to aid her in the work of building a new human being? There is but one answer to the question, it seems to me.

Voluntaryism the True Test of the Necessity of War.

"The Free Life," for Nov., London, Eng.

The present war agitation in this country will help to raise a great question. Are those who want to fight, to have the power to make others, who wish for peace, pay for the fighting; and even turn them into fighting material and pack them off as soldiers to the battlefield? Distinctly not—is our Voluntaryist answer. The fighters—whether they are many or few—must do their own fighting and pay the bill. That is the one true guarantee of peace. If war is a real necessity, far the larger part of the nation will be ready to do its duty, freely and without compulsion, if it is not a necessity, if the newspapers have written it up, if the jingoes have raked the fires, if the government has been weak and given way to pressure, if the cause o war is one of those unutterably stupid points of honor, then the fighters cannot be given possession of the minds, bodies and wealth of the peaceable citizens, and allowed to carry on war by turning their fellow men and fellow women into slaves. The fighters cannot complain of this condition. If the peace element in a nation is small, then the fighters will be deprived of only a small support; if it is large, then it is against even the general still half-instructed sense that already exists in these matters, that a large part of the nation should be made the tools of others for such a terrible purpose. If the fighters are only a chque and cannot pay the expenses of their fighting, then let them abstain from fighting; if they really represent the nation, they have all the power that they can claim at their back. Voluntaryism is the true test of the necessity of war. Let the individual judge for himself. Nobody else can judge for him in these supreme matters. Remember the moral of the last American war. To a great extent the nation, only half-consenting, were pushed into that war. On April 23, "The Speaker" summed up, certainly mildly enough, the case when it wrote: "People recognize as freely as most educated Americans do, that the war has been precipitated by the Jingo party in the United States and that many of the steps which have led to it have not been seemly."

In our view, it is monstrous that a tyrant or a military usurper should be able to burden future generations of men simply because he is in possession of the machinery of government. If investors knew that in International Law, loans contracted under circumstances which created a fair presumption that the people were unwilling to incur the debt would not attach to the country in the event of a change of government, there might be less of that monetary support of misgovernment which has been the disgrace of the high finance of the nineteenth century." "The Speaker" does not go quite far enough. The interest of debt is paid by individuals, and on them falls the burden. It is for the individuals to consent to bear this burden—each for himself, and not for another. When men see more clearly, they will understand that they cannot impose burdens on each other. A free life for all, and free choice as regards the obligations that each one undertakes—that is our future. Any imposition of burdens on each other is only slavery under another name. What the tyrant cannot do, that the majority of the hour cannot do.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

ON TUESDAY evening, Dec. 27, about thirty of Lucifer's friends gathered at the home of the editor to spend an evening with him before he starts on his "vacation." A very entertaining talk on Physical Culture was given by M. Florence Johnson, and so well pleased were her hearers that a class was organized to study under her instruction. The editor, we are happy to be able to report, is at length gaining decidedly in health and strength, and it is probable that a few weeks of rest will entirely restore him to his normal strength of mind and body. An important element or factor in hastening his recovery has been the cordial and sympathetic expressions of good-will from friends at home and abroad. These friends have our most sincere thanks for their sympathy and interest in us and in our work. L. H.

Close of Volume—The Brunonian Era, etc.

With this week's issue we reach the close of the current volume of Lucifer—"Son of the Morning"—and also the end of the year 1898 of the Christian calendar, or 298 of the Brunonian, or more scientific calendar.

The Christian era, it is claimed, began with the birth of its reputed founder. But no one knows, or pretends to know, the year, the month or the day on which Jesus the Nazarene was born. Moreover, the biographical sketches of the Nazarene, contained in the so-called "Synoptic Gospels," are so full of crudities, contradictions, improbabilities, not to say impossibilities—added to the anonymous and wholly unauthorized character of these records themselves—that many very learned men have doubted the existence, even, of the "Son of Man"—as he is said to have named himself—as a historical personage. These with other like reasons have caused some of our chronologists to reject the common or Christian notation or reckoning of years as unscientific and unworthy of perpetuation in an age of the world that claims to have laid aside the swaddling bands of ignorance and of childish superstitions.

But to see the desirability of change, of reform, is one thing to make a determined effort to inaugurate that change and to practicalize that reform, is quite another. However clearly we can see that our calendar is unscientific, irrational, absurd, and that it does much towards perpetuating the superstitions that clog the wheels of the car of human progress, we make but little if any effort to substitute a more rational notation. The chains of custom are hard to break. It is so much more easy and comfortable to sail with the wind and the tide than to row against them.

Among the attempts to reform the calendar and inaugurate a more rational notation is that which substitutes the death of Giordano Bruno, the distinguished Italian scholar, thinker, philosopher and champion of human freedom, in place of the mythical and wholly unreliable date of the birth of the alleged founder of the Christian cult, or religious system. Of the many martyrs to the cause of science, to the cause of human freedom and of intellectual honesty, none deserves the crown of everlasting remembrance, and of never-ending gratitude more than does Bruno. The date of his death at the hands of the Christian hierarchy at Rome, is the seventeenth of February, 1600, of the common calendar. To make the years of the reformed or scientific calendar to run parallel with those of the older and mythical one, the first year of the Brunonian era is made to begin with January of the year following the date of the death of him in whose honor it is named.

That this proposed change is only a small step in the direction of a truly scientific calendar, or system of reckoning time by months and years, is freely admitted. The year, in the earth's northern hemisphere, should begin with the winter solstice—sun-stand—or when the days first begin to gain upon the nights. Instead of twelve months—moonths—thirteen, of four weeks each, would be more natural. Other changes, such as numbering the hours from one to twenty-four, instead of one to twelve, "A. M." and "P. M." would certainly save trouble and a multitude of embarassing mistakes.

While it is perhaps hopeless to expect all these changes to come in the lifetime of those now living, it is confidently believed that if all who have cast off allegiance to Christian creeds with their unscientific teachings as to astronomy, geology—the "creation" and age of the world, etc., etc, if all these would cease to reckon time, in their daily business, and in their correspondence, by continual reference to Anno Domini—the year of our Lord—much good might come of it in the way of breaking up the enslaving and debasing superstitions that have so long enthralled the minds and bodies of men, and especially of women and children, in all lands called Christian.

The New Year and Its Work.

When this issue of Lucifer reaches its readers the new year will be a week or more old. That is to say, reckoning by the natural and not by artificial divisions of time, the year began about the twenty-first of December, as reckoned by the Gregorian or Roman church calendar.

The new year brings new duties. Each new year is a new revelation, a new occasion, a new opportunity for labor, for effort to make conditions better—better for living on the planet upon which for the present we make our home.

As some one puts it, "New occasions bring new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth. They must upward still and onward, who would keep abreast of Truth."

In all the realms of nature, so far as we know, nothing stands still, nothing is stationary. Change is the universal rule or condition of existence. Lucifer is, or can be no exception to this rule. Our Morning Star must either ascend or descend. Which shall it be?

The answer to this question must rest mainly with our readers and co-operators. If the paper were backed by accumulated capital, as nearly all financially successful publishing enterprises are, and have been, it would not be necessary to ask this question. From year to year, since the publication of the first number at Valley Falls, Kan., the light of Lucifer has been sustained and fed by the fraternal co-operation of a small, but very resolute band of workers, who have seen the importance, the necessity of agitation and investigation along the lines to which our publications have been mainly devoted. The question of continued existence and of enlargement of work rests with this pioneer band, this hitherto undismayed and unconquered band of workers, and upon those whom they can interest in the same line of work.

For the encouragement of these earnest, brave, fraternal and faithful helpers we are glad to be able to report progress, real and substantial progress, though slow and far from what could be desired. At the beginning of the new year we are in better shape to do effective work in extending the picket lines than ever before. With a good supply of new type suitable for book and pamphlet work, and with a better stock of radical reform books and pamphlets than at any time since the first issue of our little journal we feel reasonably sure that, with the aid of the helpers before-mentioned, the work of our Light-bringer will be more successful the incoming year than before.

Among the proposed plans for extension is that of publishing a monthly, each issue to be a separate pamphlet, at, say, one dollar per year. To make this plan successful it will be necessary to have several hundred subscribers—not less than five hundred—to begin with. The lack of this assured subscription list, together with the labor and expense of revising and publishing "Hilda's Home," was the cause of the temporary suspension of the serial, The Light Bearer Library, in April last.

In the annual "round-up" of the work of the old year, and in making preparations, in laying plans for that of the new, it is doubtless well to take a reckoning with ourselves—to institute investigations or comparisons as to theories concerning causes of the crimes, vices, and consequent miseries that now so sorely afflict our common humanity. Try as we may, it is clearly impossible that any of us can wholly escape complicity or responsibility in and for these crimes, vices and miseries.

On the second page of this issue of Lucifer will be found a thought-provoking article entitled "The Etiology and Treatment of Criminality." This article seems to be attracting attention in many quarters. Among other leading journals, "The Legal Adviser," Denver, Colo., gives it a prominent place in its December issue. It would seem eminently proper that members of the legal and medical professions should give this subject careful and constant attention, since the business of "doctors," both of law and of medicine, is largely if not wholly dependent upon the existence of what is known as "criminality," and of its congener, vice, or "viciousness." If people could and would live virtuous—that is, normal, non-invasive, lives, there would be no place for or need of medical and legal doctors.

While there is doubtless much valuable information to be gained from a careful perusal of Doctor Brower's article—the doctor is a Chicago man if I mistake not—and while Lucifer's readers may agree with some of his views as to the causes of vice and crime, there will be many protests against the methods of restraint and cure proposed by the learned author.

While it may be unphilosophic and irrational to condemn or discredit a man because he belongs to a particular class or profession, there can be nothing amiss in considering what the natural bias or predilection of a writer may be, because of education or of pecuniary interest. It was Dr. O. W. Holmes, I think, who said, "There never was a guild of craftsmen since the silversmiths made and sold images of Diana of the Ephesians, that did not need sharp looking after."

Naturally enough Dr. Brower—a man of medicine and also of laws—looks after the interests of himself and of his fellow craftsmen, when treating of crime and vice, their causes and cure. No! not their cure; their "treatment" is the word used. It is asking too much of human nature to expect a man to consciously work for the abolition of the source to which his occupation, his craft, owes its very existence. The regulation, the control of disease, and the mystification of its causes, is the aim and interest of the physician, as a craftsman, not its abolition or eradication. The regulation, the control of criminality, not its abolition or eradication, is the aim and interest of the lawyer, the judge and the legislator, as craftsmen, and while it is possible that the man may sometimes rise above the craftsman the usual fact doubtless is that the man is submerged in the craftsman.

To show that our author is looking and planning for the interest of his order, his class, his craft, or his crafts, we have only to note that while he condemns the administration of laws he has nothing to say against laws themselves. On the contrary, he would have more laws enacted and have their administration put into the hands of specialists, that is, of craftsmen. "Bad environment should be corrected by court proceedings," says the learned doctor. "We need legislation for drunkards." He would prevent bad heredity by "modification [restriction] of the marriage license." That is, none should be allowed to marry and propagate their kind except such as could pass a satisfactory medical examination. To keep the unfit from propagating would—on this legality plan—require penalties, sequestration, confinement, emasculation, ovariotomy, etc., that is more law. To prevent crowding in cities he would recommend "some way by which the unproductive citizen may be transported to the country." Something similar to the "penal colony system," we are left to presume.

Dr. Brower, and the many thousands who will applaud his article, see clearly enough that our present laws and their administration are failures. He and they would cure existing evils by more law—more paternalism. To many of Lucifer's readers it will doubtless appear easy to show that more paternalism would only aggravate and perpetuate the evils it professedly seeks to cure. They are prepared to show that the learned doctor's diagnosis of the case does not reach the underlying causes, and that his proposed treatment is empirical—mere quackery. That all improvement of the race must come by the application of esoteric remedies—from within, not from without. That is to say, natural evolution, through removal of restrictions and by enlargement of the field of knowledge, are the only hope of salvation from the evils, the hells of our present social system. "The cure for the evils of liberty is more liberty," not more law.

"Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets."

By S. Baring-Gould. Fascinating as fairy stories, and of great value in showing us the kindred superstitions of the childhood of the race. The Jewish, Mohammedan and "Heathen" legends of the fall of the angels, the flood, etc., are given. Though written by a preacher, the work is an aid to Free-thought. We have a few copies which we will sell at the very low price of 63 cents, and 12 cents for postage. 380 pages, printed on fine heavy paper, gilt top, mottled back, with gold lettering. Or we will send one copy with Lucifer one year to a NEW subscriber, for $1 50.

A Protest.

BY R. B. KERR.

A few days ago I received by post from New York an envelope containing a proof print of an article entitled, "Mr. Grundy Worse than Mrs. Grundy," and purporting to be by me. Evidently the article was being prepared for publication in some newspaper or magazine.

On looking it over I found that it was my recent article on "The Want of New Men," with several startling alterations. For instance, I was made to approve of the bill introduced in Kansas for the emasculation of men who committed assaults on women.

In case any reader of Lucifer should see this article and be surprised at it, it is well to mention that the alterations in it were made without my knowledge, and have not secured my approval.

The Child Question.

BY IDA BALLOU.

It is natural to love children. It is also natural to feel impatient when they mortify and gall us by their "naughtiness." Our egotism prevents our perceiving our own especial "naughtiness" and so we are as disgusted with the exhibition of it in children as if the disagreeable state belonged exclusively to them. As a matter of fact "naughtiness" is a quality—when not directly transmitted by parents or kin—of nature. Children are nothing but young animals, and with the kitten and the puppy have their playful traits. A child's invasion is the invasion of the puppy or kitten—without realization of responsibility. Of course there is the difference between the child and the lower animal, in that the former is upon a higher evolved plane and has keener sensibilities.

This should be taken into account when correction is contemplated. Do not forget, either, that the child has hidden powers of reasoning and where the puppy or kitten unquestionably accepts your reproof, the child needs reason to satisfy it in accepting your wisdom.

These thoughts were aroused by a perusal of Lizzie M. Holmes' article on "Our Children." I judge that Mrs. Holmes has a type for ideal children in her mind. It is the "sensitive, delicate, self-conscious and inaggressive" child of loving parents. Such a child is very lovable—but is the impetuous, "naughty," warm-hearted, invasive, affectionate child less so? The former gives less trouble to its guardians, but the latter is the sure product of nature and has hidden forces for good or evil, as it happens to be trained, the inaggressive child does not possess. The aggressive child can learn to discriminate between right and wrong forces and use its aggressive powers for a mighty purpose—and attain a sublime height the inaggressive child can never reach.

Like Lillian Harman, I am not so sure Mrs. Holmes is wise in keeping children "out of the public schools." In order to be a factor in society and cope with society's problems it is necessary one should know something of society itself. The public school is founded upon a wrong principle, but with good home training, I do not believe the wrong principle can work any harm.

Well, with our "fewer and better children" we can only conform to our own particular idea of what is just and desirable. It is impossible to have a rule to go by—"many men of many minds," you know.

The Bedborough Victory.

BY AN OLD ENGLISH LAW CLERK.

You and your readers have been discussing the conclusion of the Bedborough case in London, and very mistakenly casting more or less aspersions on Mr. Bedborough. You have done it because you and your correspondents do not understand English practice.

The ending is a real victory for Mr. Bedborough, for it means, in its real essence, a dismissal of the prosecution by the Crown. The fact that Mr. Bedborough put in a technical plea of "guilty" does not amount to a snap of your finger against him. It is a law plea to gain an advantage, and he got it. He acted very wisely. The sentence was a confession that the Crown has no case. It is a much greater disgrace to the Mrs. Grundy sentiment that in the face of the fact that the defendant pleaded "guilty," the Court pronounces no sentence on a technical confession of wrong doing—than it was to Mr. Bedborough. Mr. Bedborough says—say he says—"Well, I am guilty of all you charge me—what about it? What are you going to do about it?" And the Crown tucks its tail betwen its legs and says: "Oh, nothing." The money saved can be better spent in propaganda than wasted in defending a lawsuit. "Discretion is the better part of valor" at times; it certainly is in this case. Bedborough did the right thing at the right time.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXIX.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THE ORGANIZATION OF INDUSTRY. In the organization of industry it will be divided first among the series; the agricultural serie, the mechanical serie, and the domestic serie, for instance. The council will elect the chiefs of the several series, who will become ex officio members of the council. From their own number the council should select the executive officers; a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, etc., and defining their specific duties. Next we have the division of the series into groups; for instance, the agricultural serie may be divided into the farming, live stock and orchard groups. The council will elect the chiefs of the several groups; and these chiefs in any serie will be the group council of that serie, the chief of the serie being its president. If the group council think it best to form sub-groups, they will in like manner elect their chiefs, who will be ex officio members of the group council, the chief of the group being its president. In all cases the power of control originates in the council, being delegated to the group councils, etc., down to the individuals.

Individuals finally control in two ways: first, by their election of the council, and second, by refraining from joining groups where the conditions are unsatisfactory, making it necessary for the authorities to change the chief or to modify objectionable regulations in order to have the work done. Individuals will temporarily join other groups where the objectionable features do not exist.

Virtue Has Its Own Reward.

BY A SEVEN-YEAR-OLD SCHOLAR.

"A poor young man fell in love with the daughter of a rich lady who kept a candy store. The poor young man could not afford to marry the rich lady's daughter because he had not money enough to buy furniture. A wicked man offered to give the young $25 if he would become a drunkard. The young man wanted the money very much so he could marry the rich candy lady's daughter, but when he got to the saloon he turned to the wicked man and said: 'I will not become a drunkard even for great riches. Get thee behind me, satan!' On his way home he found a pocket-book with a million dollars in gold. Then the young lady consented to marry him. They had a very grand and beautiful wedding, and the next day they had twins. Thus you see, 'virtue has its own reward.'"

[This is a fair sample of the "virtue" evinced in "respectable society," and for which our martyrs for a more honest education sex-wise for both young and old, are being sent to the penitentiary. How long before people will learn to think and reason for themselves? Who can tell? FLORA W.]

Lending a Hand.

We gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following sums to sustain the publication of Lucifer—sent in response to the proposition of Henry W. Youmans and of others:

J. H. Kallmeyer, 50c; Elisha Crawford, $1; Henry C. Roberts, 50c; E. D. Wileman, 50c; Joshua Harman, $1.50; S. M. des Lespinasse, $2.50; Friends, Illinois, $4; Dr. M. Newby, $1; Mrs. P. Clark, $1; E. D Luce, $10.

THE DATA OF ETHICS, by Herbert Spencer, is a book needed in every library. Here is an opportunity to obtain a handsome copy of this masterpiece, practically free. We have obtained a small supply handsomely bound in maroon cloth, with gold lettering and gilt tops, printed in large, clear type on good heavy paper. It contains 350 pages, and is divided into sixteen chapters. Until the present supply is exhausted we will send a copy of this book to anyone who sends us the address of a NEW subscriber, accompanied by one dollar for Lucifer one year, and ten cents for postage on the book. This is an offer which you cannot afford to miss, and which we cannot afford to duplicate after these books are gone.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. By Herbert Spencer. 525 pages. Style of binding, paper, etc., similar to "Data of Ethics." Our stock of these books is small, but as long as they last we will send a copy of "First Principles" to any one sending us $1 for a NEW subscriber, and 13 cents for postage on the book.

ON LIBERTY. By John Stuart Mill. 200 pages. Fine paper. Gilt top. Handsomely bound in green and gold. Well-executed ortrait of the author. Price, 50 cents, postage paid.

The "Blue Grass Blade" accuses a Lucifer correspondent with being drunk, writing jargon, etc., because he wrote "execution proof honesty," and the typo set it "executive proof honesty." It is passing strange that a newspaper man, accustomed to typographical errors, could not see at a glance that this was an error.

VARIOUS VOICES.

R. Leonhardt, Tacoma, Wash.—The copy of "Loma" received. Grand work; hope the ideal will be realized in time to come.

E. E. Eads, M. D., Oakland City, Ind.—Enclosed please find order for one dollar, for which give my subscription a longer lease on Lucifer—the best edited and best paper published, always reaching for the tap root of the most important question of the age.

Stella Campbell, St. Louis, Mo.—I am delighted to see that you occasionally publish some of Will Hubbard-Kernan's poems. There is no other poet that can combine truth, strength and tenderness as Kernan can. I have "The Flaming Meteor." Hope that your health is improving.

Richard Conway, Carroll, Iowa.—Find enclosed one dollar for which please send "The Flaming Meteor" (by Kernan) to enclosed address. Please fill the order so it will reach her before Christmas. I will send a stamped and addressed envelope and ask you to send me if you can the address of the author. I consider Kernan and Burns the two greatest poets.

C. E. N., Boston, Mass.—Inclosed please find twenty-five cents United States postage to pay for Lucifer from 738 to 751. If Lucifer should print a request to all of its readers to mail the paper as soon as they have read it to some one who has not seen it, one to a different person each week, and also if you should print in each number where it can be obtained in the large cities it might help the circulation.

P. M. M., Iowa.—I must write you to stop Lucifer coming to me until further orders. My legal owner, as you know, objected to me taking it, so I hired a box. Through the carelessness of the postmaster he found out I was getting it in a private box and he has made such trouble I have to give up the box. So please send no more until I can make further arrangements. I am in arrears on subscription but will make it good as soon as I can, and will try to fix some way to read the Light Bearer. Yours in bondage.

E. D. Wileman, Toledo, Ohio.—I notice that my subscription is nearing its expiration, and as I am sure you need the amount quite as much as I do, and as I try to believe in the motto of "to every one as his needs," I enclose herewith the amount. I also enclose my mite towards what I hope will be a very merry Christmas and happy New Year. It is small, I know, but may be a good many others will do likewise, and the aggregate will be of some use. Please put it wherever most needed and accept the compliments of the season.

I. W. Herman, Rockville, Neb.—Find enclosed one dollar, for which send to my address your greatest of truth givers, Lucifer, for one year. I received the two sample copies of Lucifer you sent me yesterday. I had given up all hope of ever getting a copy, but at last the real truth advocate came in all its glory, and as can be seen I have lost no time in helping the cause. When I think of the liberty and justice in nature's store, which are being denied us by human ignorance, it makes me shed tears of grief, and more, when I view the long, long night to come. Alas, when shall the rays of liberty shine to lighten the dark and weary night?

William Schemenour, Waterville, Ohio.—I would like to say in reply to Elsie Cole Wilcox in No. 741: Yes, certainly—there is no compulsion in this matter of donations to enlarge the Light Bearer. I asked only those who might want to contribute, to do so. The stern fact confronts me, as it does so many thousands of my fellow toilers, that we have not been raised to affluence by the McKinley wave of prosperity. We might have Jehovah—the Almighty—sitting on the throne at Washington, D. C., but so long as we allow the issue of money to be monopolized as now, we shall continue to have such waves of prosperity as that of McKinley—waves which raise the value of the dollar and cheapen labor and its products. Sister Wilcox should not complain. We are all benefitted by the articles of Mr. Walker and Rev. Holmes. I predict no such disaster as tha mentioned by Mrs. Wilcox. The readers of the paper are too well balanced for that, and so long as the United States censors of the mail and the Comstock filibusters keep hands off we wil continue to see the star of the Light Bringer shining in every land where human hearts beat in sympathy with human woes.

Sarah Stone Rockhill, O.—Your last editorial in Lucifer has been the last straw to break my silence or break up the spirit of procrastination which has held me for so long from doing what I should have done long ago—send in my subscription—for it has never lagged before. It does seem that Lucifer's friends should see to it that you have the opportunity to build up—if money can do it—though it seems we all have many ways for our scant means. I do hope that our worthy brother, E. W. Chamberlain, will feel that the means of the defense fund can be used in no better way than to save liberty's defender—for I fee, that your life is consecrated to the defense of liberty for women and I think we must, if possible, save that life for its noble work. I think my poem on "Consecration" must have been written for you and such as you—so I send it to you with this, also one dollar for my renewal and fifty cents for the paper covered "Hilda's Home" and fifty cents for your vacation if you can find it. I think you have done well in arranging to leave your work in such worthy, efficient hands as Lillian's, but let her help you for years yet, is the sincere wish of your friend.

J. H. Kallmeyer, New Florence, Mo.—Like Friend Chamberlain I am of opinion that Lucifer and its constituency cannot yet do without its pilot—yourself. I very much hope that Friend C.'s suggestion will be made practicable through the timely and united effort of Lucifer's elect, thoughtful, progressive, though now despised constituency. To show the sincerity of the above let me quote what I intended to mail a month or more ago, but could not find the courage to do it because not able to accompany it with some of the "filthy lucre," the "God" of plutocratic imperialism.

"I am so sorry to see in last Lucifer that you are indisposed and that our valiant little "Son of the Morning" is having such a desperate struggle. It seems to me the plan of R. H. Kerr is a splendid one and practicable (that is to send a number of names and addresses to whom Lucifer may be sent and the cash to pay for same), provided all of Lucifer band will take a hand. I mean to practice along that line. Then, too, I imagine if your stock of books, or at least a considerable portion could be converted into cash it would be quite a lift."

If I am any judge No. 739 of Lucifer is the high tide issue. Perhaps I am influenced by the number of women's names. Be that as it may, nothing has moved me more that I have read in the sterling Lightbringer, and I am a deeply interested reader of everything its pages bear. I respectfully doff my hat to these ladies, Lois Waisbrooker, Myra Peppers, Alice Beresford, and Dora F. Kerr, and for one, profoundly appreciate their courageous and true utterances.

I enclose fifty cents as my mite toward making possible your taking a vacation. Would I could magnify it a hundred fold. I did not call attention to this before for reason stated above. My fervent wish is long live Lucifer and long life (relieved though of onerous care and overwork) to its peerless editor.

"Loma"—A CITIZEN OF VENUS," by Prof. Wm. Windsor. A story of surpassing interest, largely devoted to Sexologic and Sociologic problems. Like Bellamy in his "Looking Backward," the writer of "Loma" believes in the "state," as a factor in social evolution, but individualists will probably forgive this feature for the sake of the radically revolutionary ideas in regard to popular theories—sexologic, theologic, cosmologic, etc. Substantially printed and artistically bound. Price, post-paid, $1.50. Address this office.

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist in surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," R. G. Ingersoll, p. 5.

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 435 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION. A discussion between Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. The opposing principles are herein stated clearly and briefly. Valuable to those who want to possess the arguments of both sides of the question. Price 15 cents. "Life and Health, or How to Live a Century," by the same author. Price, 10 cents. "A Lecture on Religious, Political and Social Freedom." Price, 5 cents. A set, one of each, for 25 cents.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. R. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

PERSONAL A well-educated, broad minded, liberal lady, neat in person, well preserved, not far from seventy years young—alone in the world, living in an orthodox village, wishes to correspond with single gentlemen, healthy, liberal, of excellent habits, neither poor nor rich, of about the same age. The years do not make us old so much as our thoughts. With good, clean habits and sound heredity the limit of life should not be under 85 or 90. Willing to go to any of Uncle Sam's new possessions to begin life and grow up with the country. All first letters may be directed to "M." care of Lucifer.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalisation of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 15 cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 1. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JANUARY 7, B. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 744.

The Glory of Authority.

Go ring the bells and fire the guns
And fling the starry banner out;
Shout "Freedom!" till your listing ones
Give back their cradle shout;
Let boastful eloquence declaim
Of honor, liberty and fame;
Still let the poet's strain be heard,
With glory for each second word,
And everything with breath agree
To praise "our glorious liberty!"

—John G. Whittier.

BY JONATHAN MAYO CHASE.

But when the mighty cannon's roar
Awakes the echoes o'er the land
It booms for burdens more and more
Laid on the industrial band;
More guns, more warships for defense
Of Capital at Toil's expense;
A larger army trained to kill
Slaves who rebel against the will
Of moneyed masters. Thus we see
The glory of authority.

Is Woman Man's Inferior?

BY KATE AUSTIN.

The question, "Is woman doomed by natural law the inferior of man?" has been answered affirmatively by that clever and interesting writer, R. B. Kerr, in Lucifer of December 10, and, sad to say, the attitude of society, its laws and unwritten regulations, also the verdict of many learned men, have testified freely and eloquently to the natural inferiority of woman.

Centuries ago, learned theologians debated as to whether women did not lack a soul, even, as well as brain. The result was no trace of woman's soul being found, we infer that they might have had better success had the search been for brains.

Friend Kerr quotes Darwin, the great thinker, as one who pronounced "woman inferior to man in energy and perseverence." Darwin went farther than that and declared that woman was not the equal of man in courage. I will here give a few passages bearing on the mental differences of the two sexes, from "The Descent of Man."*

"The chief distinction in the intellectual powers of the two sexes is shown by man attaining a higher eminence in whatever he undertakes than can woman, whether requiring deep thought, reason or imagination, or merely the use of the senses and hands. Also if two lists were made of the most eminent men and women in all the arts and sciences the list would not bear comparison, and that if men are capable of a decided pre-eminence over women on many subjects, the average of mental power in man must be above that of woman."

Then Darwin adds these consoling remarks: "That it is fortunate the father transmits mental endowment to both sexes else man would have been as superior in mental endowments to woman as the Peacock is in ornamental plumage to the Peahen."

But this very modest estimate of man's virtues leads one to ask, If man transmits his mental qualities to his progeny, does he not endow both sexes equally? If not, why not?

The common sense view of the subject is that the endowment is equal, and that the lack of intellectual development in the female must be laid at the door of artificial restraints, namely, customs, laws and religion, and not in any mental inferiority. Darwin's theory of the inferiority of the female is based on the fact of her enslavement. And he argues that "Man being more powerful in body and mind than woman, keeps her in a far more abject state of bondage (in a savage state) than does the male of any other animal."

In the realm of intellect, Darwin stands without a peer, yet, being human, it is possible that in some of his views he was the most mistaken of men. Bondage does not always imply mental inferiority. All must admit that among the names of great writers, artists and inventors man heads the list in point of numbers, but there are not a few women who stand on a level with man in these respects. George Eliot, the grand English woman, stands without a peer; and Wendell Phillips declared that the brain of Harriet Martineau was worth 40,000 men.

But while one must admit the superior attainments of man, what could or can we expect from a class that are the victims of what Darwin calls "abject bondage;" that were allowed no educational privileges to speak of, except in the last fifty years; that were taught from the cradle up that the sole aim of woman's existence, as Dr. E. B. Foote quaintly puts it, was "To glorify man and serve him forever."

Women—and men as well—even today are the victims of laws and customs that originated ages ago in brute force. In that dim past, when men lived in caves and fought each other over the possession of a bone or a woman, was born the infamous law that "Might makes right." Woman had no choice to speak of. She was the property of the strongest, and always a beast of burden.

Slowly the human race crept on. Man extended his powers in many ways but he never willingly let go of any privileges. The governments founded on physical force reached out and encircled the earth. The majority, the cruel always in the lead, many of them but intellectual monsters. Woman, as a rule, submitted in silence, the noisy ones received the ducking stool, the pillory or death. But revolt is never quite extinguished, and today the rebels among women are boldly proclaiming by deeds as well as words, that there is "no sex in brain."

A little over a year ago, Mary H. Krout, a newspaper correspondent in London, writing to the Chicago "Inter-ocean," stated that at the "great University of London, where women stand on absolute equality with man, and where the examinations are the most thorough and difficult of any women stood higher than men and received proportionately a greater number of degrees."

Here it seems when woman stood on equal ground with her brother, she surpassed him. Just a year ago the first woman was granted leave to practice medicine in Austria, and to get that privilege had to appeal in person to the emperor, every authority below him having refused this gifted woman, although she stood very high in all her examinations. Think of such bigotry, and of the injustice of asserting that woman is mentally inferior to man in face of the fact that for ages man has usurped all privileges for himself. As late as 1849 it was necessary for Margaret Fuller, of Boston, to make a "plea for the higher education of woman," said plea helping to open the doors of some schools for her sex.

In China they take female children of five or six years and bind their feet to distort and stop growth, as a dependent, helpless woman is considered the most attractive. In other lands they bind and cramp the brains of women, beginning also at a very tender age, and the reason for this is that dependent women make better slaves. Now no one would be so foolish as to assert that the feet of Chinese women are naturally deformed. We know that at birth they were straight and beautiful like her brother's, but a cruel and artificial restraint deformed them. Likewise it is as foolish to assert that woman is mentally inferior to her brother when it is plain to be seen that her brain receives, in a majority of cases, the same treatment accorded to the feet of Chinese girls.

Common sense and observation confirm woman's mental equality with man when given an equal opportunity, and Darwin declares that "if woman ever hopes to equal man or keep in sight, she must take an active part in the struggle for existence." But here comes Brother Kerr with the objection "That the long and the short of the whole matter is that woman is not able to fight the battle of life on an equality with man." And the principal reasons in the objection are the "disabilities connected with the functions of maternity," and "disadvantages on account of their physical structure." As to the latter assumption I deny it. The average woman, well developed and disciplined to hard work, is the equal of the average man in "staying" qualities. I have known Swedish women to work all day in the harvest field, binding grain, and at night—while the men rested—do their housework and milk the cows.

The physical structure of woman is really not so delicate, if allowed a healthy and active development. But it is an evident fact that maternity was the most powerful factor in the enslavement of woman—that, and not natural mental inferiority to her master, as the great Darwin and many others have taught.

Primitive man took brute advantage of the all-powerful mother instinct; the instinct that prompts the female to lay down even her life for her offspring; and woman became a "Hewer of wood and a drawer of water," and a bearer of children. But it remained for modern man to reduce the subjection of woman to a fine art, and it is safe to assert that civilized women have submitted to indignities that were never heaped upon their savage sisters.

We observe that among the lower animals the female depends upon her own resources, for her own support and generally for that of her young, and as a result shows more sagacity and intelligence than does the male. If this is not true of the human female it is because of her dependence on the male and shows that she has degenerated from the original type that was forced to succumb to brute force.

I have read that there was little if any difference in the brain development of males and females of savage races, and that the marked difference began with the civilized races, when, as a rule, the male takes the more active part in the domain of intellect, and the female is either a petted and pampered doll, or over-worked, child-bearing drudge.

She must make her choice. If she prefers dependence on man, she is doomed to slavery and mental inferiority. Should she choose an "active part in the struggle for existence" she will win what Darwin offered and what a few noble women past and present have won—equality and liberty; for the mental inferiority of woman is but the effect of a cause, and that cause is "abject bondage."

Caplinger's Mills, Mo.

"Love is Only Love Left Free."*

Julie Vom Berg.

I begin with the declaration that I advocate "free love" completely and decidedly. But the expression is incorrect and ought to be "freedom in love." Indeed, can any other kind of love exist except free love? Can love be commanded or forced? Something of this sort seems hitherto to have been in the minds of our philosophers of love, who have learned their philosophy in Constantinople or Utah apparently, and who can let a slave pass as their beloved. Among all the daughters of the goddess Liberty there is none, who, according to her nature, must possess the properties of her mother in a higher degree than Love. Love and free love are therefore synonymous. It ought not to be necessary to talk of free love, any more than of wet water, or hot fire. I might, however, conceive of love as not free in the sense that the feeling, the necessity, the passion that unites two beings, binds them completely, destroys their free will, turns them irresistibly away from everything else. But just because true love has this effect, exerts this power, creates this necessity, it ought no more to be hindered in its choice, by external force, than it will require external bonds to insure its permanence. A man and woman who do not love each other ought not to be united, or where they are united, they ought again to be separated; a man and woman who love each other ought not to be kept apart, and they need no external force to remain together. This is the simple statement of what I understand by freedom in love, which is the only means of securing what has now become so rare—a true marriage and a happy family life. Let him who does not agree with me have the courage to postulate the opposite and declare, that those who do not love each other ought to be united, to be kept together by force, those who love each other ought to be separated and to be kept apart by force—both in the interest of humanity and human happiness!

Although no man in sound mind dares to make such a demand, it seems in practice, to be the guiding principle almost everywhere. If all the considerations, whose slaves men are nowadays, would only drop for a period of twenty-four hours, not ten of the so-called marriages would exist next day.

For married people and their progeny the consequences of the existing relationships of force and prostitution are truly appalling. But this same society, especially the male portion of it, never wearies of pronouncing their anathemas on freedom in love. "Free love" is a word of terror, but free prostitution has become a social institution, which is approved inside and outside of marriage by a legal license.

And shall I tell you why men condemn freedom in love? Because it would be the death of freedom in prostitution! Our male teachers, who can discourse so wisely on nature, nowhere show their incapacity to judge of our nature more than in their anxiety that freedom will lead us whither it has led them. Give woman freedom, and she will love according to her own tastes and emotional needs; give man freedom—he already has it—without giving it to woman, and he will prostitute himself according to his habit. Prostitution does not proceed from woman any more than slavery does from the slave; as the latter must be charged to the oppressor, so the former must be charged to man. "Free love" for woman signifies the end of prostitution, just as free self-determination for the slave signified the end of slavery.

*This extract is taken from Part II. of "The Rights of Women and the Sexual Relations," now for the first time published in English. The speech of Julie Vom Berg is given in an imaginary "Convention of German Women in Frauenstadt." Part I. of the "Rights of Women" had a large sale, and no doubt the new edition will be wanted by all who have the earlier translation. The price of the book is 50 cents for paper cover, $1 for cloth. For sale at this office.

Hobson, the Kisser.

BY N. C. MATHERS.

"The Chicago Journal" says, "The scene in the Auditorium Sunday night when Lieutenant Hobson was kissed by 163 morbid women was loathsome. It is pitiable, it is sad, that a man of his excellent courage and fine intelligence should so far forget the dignity of the American Navy as to lend himself to a public exhibition of female hysteria."

But Hobson says, "It was all prompted by purely patriotic enthusiasm."

If that is true, we are many of us more patriotic than we thought when it comes to measuring our patriotism by the number of pretty girls and women that we are willing to kiss. I should just like to ask him (if that is true) why he should select only females, and perhaps the prettiest of the lot? Why did he not kiss the men as well as the women? Are there no patiotic men, or patriotic plain women?

Hobson must be somewhat of a varietist, as he says, "I suppose if I had kissed one woman as often as I kissed different women today I would be thoroughly exhausted. But the constant change is delightfully exhilarating. It is a very enjoyable experience to me."

I should like to ask those three or four thousand women that he kissed on his way to Denver, why none of them have been bestowing their kisses on any of the other seven men who voluntarily risked their lives just as Hobson did, by going with him to sink the Merrimac? Were they not as brave and fully as patriotic as Hobson? And were their lives not as valuable to them as Hobson's life was to him. His name has been on every American tongue, he has been lauded to the skies as the greatest hero of the war. And I have searched the leading dailies diligently and have failed to find any of the names of the other seven men even mentioned. Are there no heroes minus shoulder straps, commissions and big pay? Of course these are foolish questions, but I just ask them for the other fools to ponder over.

Why is this? Is it just because Hobson held a commission, and received a little better pay than the other seven patriotic and unnamed heroes? If so, why do the fools volunteer to risk their lives for their country without a commission? Why don't they stay at home and let the commissioned officers fight it out among themselves, as they get all the glory, all the honor, all the money and all the kisses?

The Questions of Our Little Ones.

The following is taken from a private letter written by Vee H. Vincent. As it gives a good mother's experience in dealing with a very important question, I have asked and received her permission to print it in Lucifer:

MY DEAR LILLIAN: I enclose ten cents for Mr. Walker's pamphlet, "What the Young Need to Know." It is such a big, big question one can hardly inform one's self enough. I've always had a general idea that mother's instruction should begin with the first question and ever after be strictly honest and clear. But as to whether I'm skillful enough I've been in doubt, and have not been able to secure reading matter enough to lift the doubt.

Some of my boy's questions have almost been enough to take the seriousness away—for the time being. For instance, there was a step in the ladder when I told him that all animals grew from eggs—broad enough wasn't it? Well, the questions were "fast and furious" sometimes; chickens grew from chicken eggs, dogs from dog eggs, etc. He was looking out of the window one day and saw a colored woman pass. Whereupon he asked, "Do colored people grow from colored eggs?"

Of course the next step was to explain that some beings grew inside of the egg while warmed by the mother's body—as fowls—while others began to grow from a very tiny egg inside the mother's body, etc., etc. Sometimes it has been awfully hard to convey my meaning so that he will get it as it is meant. And I have been criticised by women who do not understand; who think I am conveying information the boy ought not to know. But I don't need to tell you, who have stood out so bravely for right all these years against enormous opposition.

We have a girl baby—two years old in February. I had thought, as you expressed it some weeks ago, that I should have Ted with me during parturition. Some time before the expected period his father and he went walking, and Henry told Ted that mamma was carrying a baby and that we expected it to be born in a few weeks. When they came back he whispered to me, "Are you carrying a baby? Papa said so." He wished then we might use an X ray to see whether 'twas a girl or boy; he wished it to be a boy.

Well, I flunked when the hour came. I was in the midst of my relatives in Southern Ohio—in an orthodox community. When delivery came Ted was asleep and remained so.

Next day he told a boy we'd got a baby. Boy asked, "Where did you get it?" Answer: "It was born of my mother same as I was."

Boy asked his folks at table about babies being born of their mothers, and was suppressed and told that if he talked that way again they'd put him into the furnace; and I was a curiosity, a crank, well-meaning, perhaps, but mistaken, and so queer to talk so to a child.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXX.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

PROPORTIONATE REPRESENTATION. The theory of equality is contradicted throughout nature. Individual atoms and molecules are probably identical in their character, but no two organized structures are alike. Equality of rights, as a universal proposition, is also contradicted throughout nature. A mouse, for instance, has no right to an equal division of food with an elephant. The true theory is equality of proportiona rights; that is, the rights of individuals are proportional to their conditions and circumstances. Effects proportional to causes, directly follows from the principle that equal causes produce equal effects. The producer has a right to results in proportion to his effective labor. The influence of planets upon the solar system is in proportion to their mass. So in an organization, equity requires that representation should be proportionate to the several interests involved. An individual whose skill enables him to produce twice as much as another, has twice as great an interest in the joint production. If his labor is represented by one vote, his labor and skill combined will be equitably represented by two votes. An individual whose capital enables him to produce ten times as much as another, has ten times the interest in the joint production, and is equally entitled to ten votes. An association founded upon this principle does equal justice to all, and those with little skill or capital need not join it (they never will be missed) and it has the advantage of encouraging the exercise of skill and the utilization of capital, largely increasing the general prosperity.

"Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets."

By S. Baring-Gould. Fascinating as fairy stories, and of great value in showing us the kindred superstitions of the childhood of the race. The Jewish, Mohammedan and "Heathen" legends of the fall of the angels, the flood, etc., are given. Though written by a preacher, the work is an aid to Freethought. We have a few copies which we will sell at the very low price of 63 cents, and 12 cents for postage. 380 pages, printed on fine heavy paper, gilt top, mottled back, with gold lettering. Or we will send one copy with Lucifer one year to a NEW subscriber, for $1.20.

In general, the art of government consists in taking as much as possible from one portion of the citizens to give to another. —Voltaire.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper in 1eu has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

ON TUESDAY MORNING, January 3, our editor started southward for a rest and change. His first stop will be at Bloomington, Ill., where he will enjoy the hospitality of Lucifer's staunch friend, Col. James H. Freeman. His condition is slowly improving. The only serious difficulty he has now is occasional oppressive sensations in the region of the heart, which are particularly noticeable when he attempts to write or talk too much. It is not believed, however, that the trouble comes from the heart itself, and doubtless a few weeks of comparative rest will make a "new man" of him. Several invitations from friends in Louisiana, Alabama and Tennessee, have been received, but if his health continues to improve it is not probable that he will go so far south on this trip. If it does not improve as rapidly as we hope it will, it may be best for him to go south until the spring.

Who Wants Them?

In making up volumes of Lucifer of the years '97 and '98, we find a considerable surplus of some of the numbers. No doubt our friends can use many of these for distribution. In writing to us for them, please let us know how many you can use. If you can afford to send a few stamps, they will be very acceptable. If you cannot afford to send any, do not hesitate, because of that, to order. They are excellent material for missionary work and should not remain unutilized.

Books Received.

"THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN AND THE SEXUAL RELATIONS." This is a work which should be highly prized by every lover of liberty. It will be reviewed at length in some future issue of Lucifer. The chapter headings are as follows: Part I. An Address to an Unknown Lady Reader; Historical Review of the Legal Position of Women; The Emancipation of Woman; The Passive Prostitution of Women; The Active Prostitution of Men; The Excuses of Men; Love and Jealousy; Morality; Marriage; Adultery; Divorce; Is Marriage a Contract? "Hanging a Woman"; Religion; The Economic Independence of Woman; Liberty and the Revolution the Allies of Women; Conclusion; Postscript. Part II. Luise Meyen on Men and Women—The Rights and Condition of Women; Men; Women; The Convention of German Women in Frauenstadt; Concerning Womanhood (a lecture, 1873). 386 pages. Published by C. H. Kerr & Co.; price in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, $1. For sale at this office.

"WHY I AM A VEGETARIAN." An address delivered before the Chicago Vegetarian Society, by J. Howard Moore. 44 pages; price 25 cents. Published by Francis L. Duzenberry, McVicker's Theatre building, Chicago. This little pamphlet is a clear statement of forcible objections to the use of flesh for food.

"THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN IS AT HAND." By C. W. Wooldridge, M. D. 74 pages. Price 10 cents. Charles H. Kerr & Co., publishers. This little book is written in the interest of the Co-operative Commonwealth, which, in the opinion of the author, was proclaimed to the world by Jesus of Nazareth 1900 years ago.

"THE BLUE LAWS OF CONNECTICUT." Taken from the code of 1650 and the public records of the colony of Connecticut previous to 1655. Also an account of the persecution of witches and Quakers in New England, and some extracts from the Blue Laws of Virginia. 25 cents. The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

Subscriber, Contributor and Editor—Their Inter-Relations.

BY E. C. WALKER.

I have no doubt this article will bring upon me the charge of egotism, but I shall not mind that—we are all egotists, each in his or her natural way. Call me what you will, so only that I make my meaning clear.

Elsie Cole Wilcox says I monopolize the space in Lucifer. She goes so far as to assert that "not a week passes" that I am "not heard from." Mr. Harman noted this exaggeration, but as Mrs. Wilcox's averment is eighty per cent true, and as that is an enormous percentage, taking the average of my critics, I am rather pleased than offended by her inaccuracy. Accuracy is not the strong point of many persons who write for the reform press; if it were, perhaps there would be more space available for them and consequently less for me.

Not to quarrel with my good friend nor to attempt to convince her I am not a monopolist, will the succeeding paragraphs be written. I wish merely to lay before the readers of Lucifer some of the reasons why I occupy a great deal of space in this paper.

1. Comstockism is a dominant, menacing and growing power in this country. With the exception of Mr. Chamberlain, I think I am the only contributor to Lucifer who keeps close track of the outrages committed by this power and writes up in detail for the paper the court proceedings which are parts of these outrages, analyzing the utterances of lawyers and the decisions of judges, and pointing out wherein they travesty good sense and logic, flout fundamental guarantees of citizen right, deny equal liberty, and rob and imprison unoffending men and women. Many of the longest articles which have appeared in the paper during the last two years have dealt with this important subject, and I, who wrote most of them, calmly claim that they had the right of way over any other matter that might be offered. Freedom of press and mails is vitally necessary, and it can be conserved and extended only by making every person who can be reached acquainted with the dangers that threaten and the crimes which are almost daily committed by the representatives of irresponsible power. Disquisitions upon the abstract right to do this or that, or upon the advisability of doing this or that are very well when their printing does not crowd out the records of concrete tyranny.

2. Closely related to this class of communications are those short paragraphs which deal with the foolish and vicious utterances of the defenders of the existing society or with their legal and extra-legal crimes. Ministerial, newspaper and "reformatory" pleas for more and worse laws, for a still viler espionage and shackling of the individual, and the unspeakable villainies of mob and of judge and of jury should be known to the friends of liberty everywhere. In "Plumb-Line Penographs" and in other paragraphs from my pen, I have endeavored to supply the readers of Lucifer with facts and arguments with which to help carry forward the propaganda in which all are interested. It is not my fault that this class of work has been very largely left to me, but Mrs. Wilcox should understand that I, also, have a grievance akin to hers, for a large amount of the "copy" of this kind especially, has gone from me to Lucifer but has never seen the light of day. But this was inevitable; had I the time for the work, I could each week fill the paper with such excerpts and comments.

3. As all other members of the Free Propaganda, except Mr. Morton, have failed to write in its interest, it has devolved upon me to present its claims to the world reached by Lucifer and of course these articles help make up the aggregate which has so disturbed my Washington comrade.

The editor most clearly stated the general principles that must govern the action of the conductor of a reform journal if he is to make his paper as useful as it is possible to be made, although I look with apprehension upon the influence of the moneyed backer of such a publication, unless he is a man of deep culture and broad views, or if he is not, is conscious of his limitations and so is willing to leave the management in the hands of the expert in the editorial room. The subscriber pays his subscription and gets his paper, thus, presumably receiving a quid pro quo for his money, for the assumption must be that if he felt the paper was worth less to him than the money he gave for it he would discontinue his subscription. Unless he is personally attacked in its columns he can rightfully make no demand for the insertion of his communications; their admission must depend upon their merit as contributions to the discussion of whatever question may be at issue. And it must be understood that civil criticisms of his opinions are not attacks upon his character.

After all, the editor is the man upon whose shoulders lies the burden of responsibility for the conduct of the paper, and unless he is free to accept any article because of its merits or to reject it because of its demerits, he is under duress and his journal is less than the expression of his knowledge and convictions. The progressive minister who is in dread of his pew-holders, the politician who votes for iniquitous laws because fearful of losing the support of his ignorant and bigoted constituents, the publisher of the daily paper who must keep his finger on the pulse of the advertiser, and the editor of the reform journal who prints communications in order to please subscriber, canvasser, or giver of cash, and not because the articles are the best at his command, are all less than free men, very much less than free men. The reform editor has certain definite principles to advance; how can any contributor insist that he insert articles which he thinks are not so well calculated to advance those principles as are other articles? The editor has infinitely more at stake than has any other man and he should not be urged to commit intellectual suicide. It is a pity that he is often compelled to avoid more or less quick financial suicide by publishing matter that has little or no claim to his consideration beyond the fact that it is offered by a subscriber or donor.

As Mr. Harman notes, I have held an editorial position on Lucifer, and have also for years done editorial work on other papers, examining and preparing all communications that went into the journals with which I was connected. I know that not more than one communication in ten received by these reform papers was fit, by reason of its construction, clearness and force of diction, and logical treatment of its subject, to receive the honor of large type and a position among leading contributions. And of those which by able treatment of the subject were fit for such honor, not one in five could go directly from the envelope to the compositor—nearly all must first be carefully gone over for the detection and elimination of errors of construction, punctuation, capitalization and the like. Under such circumstances, the overworked editor, worried by the continual calls for "copy," is always tempted to hand out first the communications which are type-written and which require the least revision. If he takes pride in the mental make-up of the paper for which he works and has a free hand in the selection of matter, he will endeavor to "work over" the articles which, in his judgment, best say the best thoughts on any given topic, regardless of the authors' names, or their relations to the journal.

My ideal of a really free reform paper is this: The editor always prints what he thinks is best adapted for the advancement of his cause, whether what he prints is from the pen of one man or woman, from the pens of five of a hundred of subscribers or non-subscribers, whether first appearing in his journal, or in exchanges, home or foreign.

The Meaning of Liberty.

Woman's emancipation means freedom, liberty. It means liberty pure and simple; failing of which, it is, according to its degree, oppression, suppression, tyranny. It means liberty to enter any and all fields of labor—trade, profession, science, literature and art—and liberty to compete for the highest positions in the land. Liberty to choose her companion, and equal liberty to change. Liberty to embrace motherhood in her own way, time and place, and freedom from the unjustly critical verdict and action of society concerning her movements. She will no longer recognize society's right to condemn in her practices condoned in man. No more a slave, she will be a true comrade; independent of man, as he is independent of her; dependent on him, as he is dependent on her. And the sex question will be settled. All this, and more, when woman shall be free, and enjoy an equality of liberty with man.—Liberty.

The Man Who Isn't Some One Else.

[DEAR MRS. HARMAN: I clip and send you some lines which I think would fit exceeding well into the poet's corner of Lucifer. ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN].

You don't know Henry Jenks because that ain't his rightful name,
But no matter what you call him—Jones or Jenks—it's all the same;
He used to be as fine a boy as I had ever knew—
But he went and fell in love one day, and then got married, too.

They didn't have no parents that could set him up in trade,
And they had to do their livin' on the wages that he made,
But Henry loved his "little girl" and bravely worked away,
And didn't mind the knocks he had to stomach through the day.

Things went along a year or two as pleasant as could be,
And then Hank's "little girl" begun to hint around that she Would like some things that other girls she used to know had got—
In fact, she seldom spoke, except to whine about her lot.

Old Hank he stood the buffets that he had to git from men,
And then he went home at night, to be hauled through the coals agen—
That is, he stood it fer awhile, and then, first thing she knew
He didn't hurry homeward when the heavy day was through.

I saw him as he staggered down the street the other night,
But I didn't stop to tell him that he wasn't doin' right—
God pity him who slaves all day and does the best he can,
And then is jawed, at night, because he ain't some other man.

—S. E. Kiser in "Cleveland Leader."

The speculator is a robber who robs the producers of the articles produced by forcing them to accept inadequate compensation for their toil, and the consumers by forcing them to buy from him at an enormous advance.—Max Nordau.

Life is too short for any bitter feeling;
Time is the best avenger, if we wait,
The years speed by, and on their wings bring healing.
We have no room for anything like hate.
This solemn truth the low mounds seem revealing,
That thick and fast about our feet are stealing—
Life is too short.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

She knew things as soon as they happened—sometimes a little sooner. And in the latter case she had "always foreseen." The life of the good Widow Banselius was spent in an engrossing and almost feverish interest in those matters which in no wise concerned her.—Maartens.

THE DATA OF ETHICS, by Herbert Spencer, is a book needed in every library. Here is an opportunity to obtain a handsome copy of this masterpiece, practically free. We have obtained a small supply handsomely bound in maroon cloth, with gold lettering and gilt tops, printed in large, clear type on good heavy paper. It contains 350 pages, and is divided into sixteen chapters. Until the present supply is exhausted we will send a copy of this book to anyone who sends us the address of a NEW subscriber, accompanied by one dollar for Lucifer one year, and ten cents for postage on the book. This is an offer which you cannot afford to miss, and which we cannot afford to duplicate after these books are gone.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. By Herbert Spencer. 525 pages. Style of binding, paper, etc., similar to "Data of Ethics." Our stock of these books is small, but as long as they last we will send a copy of "First Principles" to any one sending us $1 for a NEW subscriber, and 13 cents for postage on the book.

ON LIBERTY. By John Stuart Mill. 200 pages. Fine paper. Gilt top. Handsomely bound in green and gold. Well-executed ortrait of the author. Price, 50 cents, postage paid.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Henry C. Roberts, Bennington, Kan.—Enclosed find fifty cents to be used as you think best. I hope to send a small book order later on. We hope you will take a vacation and soon be well again. Yours for the diffusion of the light.

W. T. Roberts, Rusk, Okla.—"A Physician in the House" was duly received, and I find it to be just as good as represented or better.

[We have sent a number of copies of this work to prospective purchasers on approval and not one has returned it. All have expressed satisfaction with the book and with the price. We have now reduced the price from 2.75 to 2.50. See advertisement in this issue.

J. W. Herman, Rockville, Neb.—Please find enclosed $1, for which send Lucifer to my brother as per address below. I do this with the hope that he may, after reading it, become a future member and co-worker in the great cause for liberty.

[The above is from a new subscriber—one who has read Lucifer only a few weeks. This is the best possible way to spread the light. Money paid for new subscribers is many times more useful than that sent as a gift].

M., Palmetto, Fla.—Enclosed find $2 for Spencer's "Data of Ethics" and "First Principles;" also postage. Please send me the address of "G. A." Neb., mentioned in Lucifer No. 740. O, my dear, the miserable superstition is at the bottom of nearly all our woes. If there were not over one-third of the children born that are, I truly believe there would be more and better ones raised, while mothers would not be such broken-down slaves.

[Will "G. A." please send his address to this office?]

John H. Strong, Eagle Bend, Minn.—I herewith enclose $1.50, one dollar to apply on subscription, and fifty cents to pay for one copy of "Hilda's Home." Would like to help you more, but that long looked for prosperity does not strike this section as it should. I feel that you are sacrificing your time and energy to try to teach people who stop their ears and shut their eyes, but when you are many years in spirit you will be looked upon as having been a great emancipator.

Sarah J. Gill, Indianapolis, Ind.—I was quite surprised to see by the wrapper on the paper this week that my subscription was almost out, and that I never intend shall happen while I am "above ground," so inclosed please find one dollar for the coming year. I am so sorry not to be able to help your father take his—without doubt—much needed vacation. He has my sincere love and hope that he may come back to you strong and well. How proud you must be of such a father, as I well know he is of his daughter.

T. C. Nordvie.—Though money is very scarce, I must nevertheless send for the book "First Principles," by Herbert Spencer. I ought to have made the dollar full so as to get the advantage of your special offer, but as it is I will send you seventy cents in all, seven cents over, and ask you to inclose your "Digging for Bedrock." I owe some for the paper, but have to let that go this time. I have had it three months at different times, but am not able to see the thing as the paper states it. But I must confess I am as ignorant as can be as to the sexual relations.

J. S. Hughes, Lebanon, Ore.—Please send me the following list of books: "Some Problems in Social Freedom," "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs," "Ruled by the Tomb," "Horrors of Modern Matrimony," "What the Young Need to Know,' and "Love and the Law." Would you be kind enough to tell me the address of the best colony or settlement where a lover of freedom could make his home. I wish to correspond with such.

["Some Problems in Social Freedom" is out of print—at least in America. We hope to publish another edition soon. Probably the secretaries of colonies will communicate with Mr. Hughes].

D. E. Swank, Aumsville, Ore.—You will find inclosed $2.55. Send Lucifer one year to inclosed address, and send me "Data of Ethics," "Bible Temperance," "Liberty" and "Health Hints." And credit the balance on my subscription. Brother Harman, you have devoted a life's service to developing thoughts (things) in self. I, too, have labored in the same field since 1857 and fully realize the odds you have had to contend with, and the great effort required to produce a perceptible change in the the thought world; and can easily imagine how necessary and desirable it is that you should take a rest for a while. I wish you were nearer Oregon so that you could come to my house to rest.

C. C., Newport, Ky.—Although forced to keep quiet when I, too, wished to express my approbation of many of the good things in Lucifer, it did not hinder my sending out good thoughts your way. I will contribute my mite for your vacation fund. I wish it was much more. I am glad to learn that the editor of Lucifer is getting better, and hope his trip will benefit his health. We cannot afford to lose him, although his work will be ably carried on by the one whom he has appointed to be his successor. "Hilda's Home" arrived in good shape. Was pleased with it. I gave one copy to a friend, who was delighted to get it, as she had been wishing for it. Of the dollar enclosed, twenty-five cents is for thirteen weeks' subscription for a friend, some for pamphlets, and the remainder is for the vacation fund.

James Vincent, Sr., Tabor, Iowa.—Am glad to learn there is some prospect of your being able to get away for a rest. When I first read of your feebleness and hard work I felt deeply anxious, and wished I could come and help you in the office, but on second thought, the expense of getting there threw all such speculations aside. Here is another dollar to help you in any way you choose. I see that some of your readers are impatient for you to enlarge, and you ask opinions from abroad, so will give mine and say, by no means enlarge. It seems to me unreasonable to think of such a thing. Having been in the newspaper business myself, I can realize what an enormous extra burden and expense it would be. Your paper is fully as large now as the price will afford, and no enlargement should for one moment be considered until the extra cost is provided for, not left to be provided for, but actually in hand. This is my judgment. Your burden already is all you can stand under, and has occasioned present conditions.

J. H. Severance, M. D., 6118 Drexel Ave., Chicago—I see by last Lucifer, the ways and means have been provided for you to take a rest and change, for which I am truly thankful. I have been waiting for you to be stronger so I could visit you without feeling it a trespass, but can wait till you return. It is too cold for me to venture out much. Leave all cares behind you. Lillian will manage things very wisely no doubt. Try and be perfectly careless of all great movements, and may you be more successful in building up a shattered health than I have been. We that spend all our vital force constantly in reform work, have little stored up energy upon which to draw in any time of need. I hope you will soon feel renewed in spirit and body and do much valiant service for the emancipation of the race before you graduate into the next grade of life's continuous school. My love to Lillian and lots for yourself. I wish I could send you a round check for the cause, but although the spirit is willing the pocketbook is weak.

Ralph E. Galbreath, Leetonia, Ohio.—I have just read the first chapter of "Hilda's House." I must have a cloth-bound copy to keep, and the paper one goes out for the betterment o society. Noble Imelda! Alas, that the story is but fiction. Find stamps for the work if the edition is not exhausted. If the cloth are out send two paper-bound copies.

Relative to the questions of enlargement and efficiency, I would say that I do not think that enlargement means added effectiveness at all. Perhaps there are those who would find time to read a sixteen or twenty-four page weekly devoted to reform, but I fancy most of your readers are busy, and those with leisure may find many good books of our kind in Lucifer lists. A small light, if intensely bright, will pierce the darkness more deeply than a larger, duller flame. If it is desired to discuss special questions at greater length than you can at present accommodate, a supplement might be issued, the expense thereof to be borne by those wanting such issue, as W. S. suggests. I consider yourselves, however, as better able to judge correctly than your subscribers, and will be satisfied in any event.

W. W. Miller, New Haven, Conn.—As one who feels an interest in the matter, I will give you my opinion on the question of enlargement. Of course I don't presume to think that my opinion is of any consequence or will have any weight in regard to your decision, and only send my opinion to show you that I take an interest in the paper, and to aid in giving you the satisfaction of feeling that your requests made in Lucifer are read and considered. I don't care how you conduct the paper; whether you enlarge it or reduce it; whether its price is advanced or reduced; whatever happens to it (so long as I retain the mind that I now have) I will always, so long as I can raise the price of the paper, remain a subscriber to the paper.

I am glad that you are anticipating a vacation, and I am sorry, oh! so sorry, that I have not a little of the "currency of the realm" to aid you. My wages have been cut twenty-five per cent during this month because of a lack of funds in the department's treasury to pay the men full wages, and this, notwithstanding the fact that taxes last year were higher in this city than at any time previous since the foundation of the city. It is all owing to mismanagement by political party leaders. Those who hold the reins of the government of the city in their hands, have misapplied some of the city's funds, and now the city employes have to suffer for the villainy of these party leaders. Not a soul of us dares to remonstrate for fear of losing our position, poor as it is.

A Dollar Book for Fifty Cents.

DEAR LUCIFER READERS: I have made the blessed Light Bearer a New Year's present of fifteen "Irenes,', which they will sell for half price, and as the book is a handsome ornament for any parlor table, I feel sure that there are at least fifteen of Lucifer's readers who will purchase as soon as they read this, as t will be a good holiday present for any one to give a friend whom they wish to show the truthful status of woman in the present social institutions. You can tell your friends that the scenes therein are taken from real life. The District Attorney o Philadelphia called it an "awful book" when he threatened to imprison me if I did not give up the plates and books to be burned by the "Vice Society." Yes, it is awful, but it would have been awfuller had I put in the worst stories that have been revealed to me!

But the sad part is made easier by the humorous. The humorous character, "Nan," is a perfect description of a pupil of mine away out on the western prairies. The most remarkable character, Mme. Leroy, whose secret life was unfolded to me in confidence, was an efficient member of a respectable church, and with the exception of that illegitimate and hidden business she was one of the noblest women. Thus does Irene show how important is the work of our noble Lucifer, which is to make people honest and free. Many of my friends are now re-reading the book because it shows so plainly that true love alone should guide in the most sacred of all relations, and also because it is a true history of the progress of reformatory movements. In hope, Yours for all truth, SADA BAILEY FOWLER.

Wanted—

Ten thousand names of women and men who do their own thinking, or who are willing to read what others think.

The season of long nights and short days is once more upon us—the season of reflection and of retrospection; the season when, if ever, such papers as Lucifer will be given a candid and thoughtful reading. With each weekly issue a surplus is printed to send out as sample copies—as pioneers, as evangels of the newer, and as we earnestly hope, better gospel than has yet been preached to the inhabitants of earth. These surplus copies have been accumulating for some months for lack of names and addresses of persons to whom a sample copy or two would probably be welcome.

The object of this paragraph, then, is to ask our friends to send us at once a list of names of persons to whom samples may be sent with reasonable prospect that the paper will not be consigned to the waste-basket or cook-stove.

And while sending the names, if a few stamps for necessary postage, should accompany the list, the favor would be much appreciated. But, please don't forget to send the names while the matter is fresh in mind. Please write the names and post-offices plainly—if possible with pen and ink, instead of pencil as many correspondents are now in the habit of doing.

Notice.

Some friends of Emma Goldman, remembering the success of her last lecturing tour to the West, have received her consent to make arrangements for lectures at intermediate points—the lecturer to start from New York the latter part of next January. Comrades desiring further information will write to Emma Goldman, 50 First street, New York.

It has also been deemed advisable to start a fund to cover the traveling expenses, and those wishing to assist may do so by sending their contributions.

Miss Goldman's subjects are:

"Sex Problems."

"The Power of the Idea."

"Theory and Practice. A Criticism on Ethics."

"Politics and its Corrupting Influence on Man."

"Trades-Unionism; What it is, and What It Could Be."

Meetings have been arranged in Barre, Vt., Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and the mining districts of Western Pennsylvania, Chicago, St. Louis and other places. Those desiring lectures by Miss Goldman should communicate with her as soon as possible.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. "Loma"—A CITIZEN OF VENUS," by Prof. Wm Windsor. A story of surpassing interest, largely devoted to Sexologic and Sociologic problems. Like Bellamy in his "Looking Backward," the writer of "Loma" believes in the "state," as a factor in social evolution, but individualists will probably forgive this feature for the sake of the radically revolutionary ideas in regard to popular theories—sexologic, theologic, cosmologic, etc. Substantially printed and artistically bound. Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION.

A discussion between Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. The opposing principles are herein stated clearly and briefly. Valuable to those who want to possess the arguments of both sides of the question. Price 15 cents. "Life and Health, or How to Live a Century," by the same author. Price, 10 cents. "A Lecture on Religious, Political and Social Freedom." Price, 5 cents. A set, one of each, for 25 cents,

The Sanctity of Marriage.

As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint: A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

WHAT THE YOUNG

NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

PERSONAL

A well-educated, broad minded, liberal lady, neat in person, well preserved, not far from seventy years young—alone in the world, living in an orthodox village, wishes to correspond with single gentlemen, healthy, liberal, of excellent habits, neither poor nor rich, of about the same age. The years do not make us old so much as our thoughts. With good, clean habits and sound heredity the limit of life should not be under 85 or 90. Willing to go to any of Uncle Sam's new possessions to begin life and grow up with the country. All first letters may be directed to "H," care of Lucifer.

The Outcome of Legitimation.

By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print prisoners alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS

FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end and it comprises very valuable information. Price 15 cents.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 2. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JANUARY 14, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899] WHOLE No. 745.

Galileo's Prison Song.

Though you fear me, though you doubt me,
I shall win whate'er befall;
Though you jeer me, though you flout me,
Truth and I against you all!

Though you bend me, though you break me,
Time and I against you all;
Time and truth at last shall make me
Lord of you who am your thrall.

Though you chain me, though you burn me,
Yet the earth, though that befall,
Moves, and though you daunt and turn me,
It still moves in spite of all!

The Logic of Chivalry.

BY R. B. KERR.

C. L. James is a difficult man to argue with, because he is always mixing up his social ideals with the realities of contemporary life. I ask the question, "Is it just that women, while bearing alone the burdens of maternity, should be expected to bear an equal share with men of the other burdens of life?" To this Mr. James replies that when all work is done by machinery such an inequality between the sexes will be of no importance. But the sex revolution is going on daily under our eyes, and we need principles to guide us here and now through the world of today.

Moreover, Mr. James is a difficult man to argue with, because he will not face a straight issue. He is asked the simple question whether it is just that women should bear all the burdens of maternity and an equal share with man of all the other burdens of life. It is an honest question and deserves an honest answer. But that is what Mr. James will not give it. On the contrary he raises a cloud of dust by saying that he disapproves of the conduct of those who have answered it in the negative. "Chivalry," he says, "has been used as an apology for injustice; therefore chivalry cannot be founded upon accurate reasoning."

History is quite opposed to Mr. James' ideas of the relation between chivalry and justice. The advance of chivalry and justice has gone hand in hand in all countries. Among most savage races there is but little either of chivalry or any other form of justice to women. In some civilized countries, like Germany and Austria, there is little enough chivalry, and it is in the former country that women are prohibited from having political associations at all, while in the latter they have to carry loads of mortar up steep inclines, as Lucifer lately mentioned. In France there is far more chivalry, and women have a far better time of it in every way. In America there is more chivalry than anywhere else, and also more justice and liberty for women. America is the one country on the face of the earth where an ordinary man will get up and light the kitchen stove for his wife on a cold morning, and it is also the one country in which women are allowed to compete with men on equal terms in nearly every profession.

Mr. James disputes my statement that all women capable of child-bearing must average something like three children apiece in order to keep the numbers of the race even. He says that "at such a rate of increase the descendants of a single pair would in thirteen centuries number 289,000,000,000." I am thunderstruck and almost petrified by Mr. James' ignorance. Not only has Mr. James not studied the international statistics of population, but he has not picked up the ordinary knowledge that nearly everyone gets by reading the newspapers. The lowest birth-rate ever known is that of modern France, which has been for years about 3.3 to every marriage contracted. It is true, of course, that some women in France capable of child-bearing never marry, but the percentage of such is lower there than almost anywhere else. Moreover, many women marry twice or more, and these are counted every time they marry; so they probably quite offset the old maids. What has been the result of a birth-rate of 3.3 in France? In four years, from 1891 to 1895, the population of France diminished by 210,900. It would have diminished far more, were it not that there is now considerable immigration into France and very little emigration from it.

As more males are born than females, it is evident that, even if every female child born grew up and left children, it would still be necessary for them to average a little more than two children each to keep the population even. But does Mr. James not know that about five per cent of all births are still births; that in the most favored nations about 25 per cent of the children born alive never reach the age of twenty-one; and that many who grow up are unable to have children, or to have more than one or two. Of course Mr. James will benignantly tell us that it will all be very different in the twenty-fifth century. But it is self-evident that even then, women capable of child-bearing will have to average somewhere between two and three children apiece to keep the race from extinction.

Mr. James' theory of sex relations suffers from one great deficiency. It is not accurate enough for the very mathematical mind of our age. We are now accustomed to very fine scientific instruments, and we demand equally fine intellectual work. The very slightest deviation from absolute justice is offensive to the best thinkers of the day, and any proposal to throw the burdens of replenishing the species on one sex without compensation must cut as sorry a figure among the ideas of our time as a native of Tierra del Fuego would cut in the drawing room of the philosopher of Bau Claire.

CAN MEMBERS of Congress who favor the expansion of the United States by the acquisition of territory gained by conquest consistently oppose Congressman Brigham H. Roberts of Utah in expansion of his united state by acquisitions gained by conquest? In the case of Roberts at least there seems to be "consent of the governed."

In Praise of Marriage

BY D. N. SWIFT.

I am very sensible of the weakness and presumption of my task; to attempt, at the beginning of this year of grace 1899, to reason against the universal determination of the world to abolish the one time holy state of matrimony. I have heard it affirmed for certain by some very old people that the contrary opinion, even in their memories, was as much in vogue as the other is now, and that a project for the abolishing of marriage would then have appeared as singular, and been thought as absurd as it would be at this time to write or discourse in its defense. Therefore, I freely own that all appearances are against me. The marriage system, after the fate of other systems, is generally antiquated and exploded so far as any attempt at systematic adherence to its ancient force is concerned, and the mass or body of the common people, among whom it seems to have had its latest credit, are growing as much disgusted with it as their betters, some opinions, like fashions, descending from the highest to the lowest, being finally found among the most vulgar and least thinking, where at length they are dropped and vanish.

But here I may be mistaken, and must therefore be so bold as to borrow a distinction from my old namesake, the reverend dean, whose wonderful apology for Christianity I am here attempting to apply to an institution bearing today many resemblances to the religion which he so boldly satirized. I hope no reader imagines me so weak as to stand up in defense of real monogamic marriage, such as may perhaps in some amusingly primitive times (if we may believe certain modern romancers) have had some influence on men's lives and actions. To think for a moment of reverting to such impossible conditions would indeed be a wild project; it would be to dig up foundations, to destroy at one blow all the wit of our journals, to cut at the root of our laws, to destroy nine-tenths of our literature, all our poetry, and most of our art, and would be fully as absurd as the proposal of Horace, where he advises the Romans all in a body to leave their city and seek a new seat in some remote part of the world by way of cure for the corruption of their manners.

Therefore, I think this caution in itself wholly unnecessary (which I have inserted to prevent all possibility of cavilling), since every candid reader will easily understand my discourse to be intended only in defense of marriage as we have known it in our day and generation. Marriage—qualified by adultery, fornication, prostitution, seduction and the like. Actual monogamy in practice, we all know, has been for some time laid aside by general consent. But why we should therefore cast off the very name and title of marriage, although every philosopher today, judged by his work, desires it, I confess I cannot apprehend.

It has been urged by one famous freethinker (whose Christian name denotes that he shall point out the promised land, but shall in no wise enter therein) that he opposes marriage because marriage opposes Truth and Justice. Little can be said of these two foes to marriage. What has either Truth or Justice done for the great majority of this land of ours? It hath been credibly reported that Truth and Justice have long since been purchased by syndicates—a rumor which I am the more inclined to favor by reason of the undoubted disappearance of both these once-treasured household commodities.

It is also suggested that marriage should be abolished "because marriage opposes Purity." I hope I shall be forgiven a hard word if I call this a a perfect cavil. Is it not clear to all men that Purity means one thing today and another tomorrow, that yesterday's Purity is today's Filth, and that so soon as a new form of debauchery is discovered by our pastors and masters, the more recent fashion becomes impure? Today, in England, Purity is consistent with the preaching of an impossible celibacy outside marriage, the existence of all sorts of domestic corruption too abominable for recapitulation inside the marriage bonds, our streets crowded with prostitutes and frequent attempts to suppress on the stage and in literature any truthful presentation of the facts of life. Purity to those whose dictionary is a colloquial one, is the effort of suppression and we can afford to do without such purity.

It must be allowed that the recent prosecution of an editor—one Bedborough, an anti-marriage fanatic of the deepest dye—was, to speak the gentlest, a very high strain of legal power. Little can be said for the Recorder who probably reads with sympathy and acumen the works of the French authors Daudet, Zola, Paul de Kock Maupassant, Balzac and forty more, which are as outspoken as they are popular. Perhaps however he was afraid Bedborough's publications might give offence to the great American race with whom the Recorder is anxious his compatriots should be allies, and among whom, for ought we know, it may be the custom of the country to believe in marriage. Sir Charles Hall may have intended his severity as a bid for the support of Mr. Comstock and other eminent Americans. To which I answer that men should be cautious how they mislead the "intelligent foreigner" (if Mr. Comstock will pardon the adjective), by a judgment which reflects upon the wisdom of the nation.

Would any indifferent American, who should read the authors in common repute among us: Grant Allen, Robert Buchanan, Hardy, Swinburne, Meredith, Rossetti, Shelley, Byron, George Moore and other classic and modern writers, imagine the literal monogamic marriage to be our rule of faith? Does any man either believe, or say he believes, or desire to have it thought that he says he believes, one syllable of the matter? Is George Eliot unread because she lived in adultery? Is Swinburne disregarded because he praised fleshly desire? Is Hardy worse received among us because of Tess? Did Nelson find his want of belief in continence a disadvantage to him in his naval career? Is Rossetti's "Jenny" excluded from the libraries? Do not our newspapers, our plays, and our smoke-rooms reek with "blue" tales?

One of my chief reasons for respectfully opposing those who would root out the very name and savour of marriage, is that there is really no need for any such undertaking. Every rich man and many rich women, can obtain everything they desire, without any such revolutionary project. The mansions of the A——'s, the S——'s, the V——'s in America, and the R——'s, the N——'s, and the W——'s, in England bear silent but eloquent testimony to the power of wealth under present conditions. Abolish nominal marriage, and it would become increasingly difficult for even the wealthiest to purchase virgin victims to the lust which high living, lazy luxury, and brainlessness must ever happily engender.

Here next I observe that the abolition of marriage would infallibly destroy prostitution, the oldest profession in the world, a profession honored by prophetesses whose praises are sung in our sacred books, a career still accounted sacred in India, and a material service to the British troops and armies everywhere, without which the greatness of all empires would inevitably crumble into dust.

Again, it must not be overlooked by the friends of national greatness, that to extirpate marriage would lead to a general state of anarchy and wicked freedom. Liberty is a bird which is best held in completest bondage. Its wings should always be well clipped. To allow an eagle to fly in one direction only is wantonly absurd. The poor today are fortunately contented with conditions whose hardship purchases the delightful opportunities for lust and laziness which their betters enjoy. Liberty in love for these contented poor, can only mean their awakening to the joys of full-developed freedom. Our glorious republic cannot afford to run the risk of these useful millions, convinced by experience that freedom (in one direction) is good, making for new liberties directly to their own material interest, but highly detrimental to all that the highest in the land hold dear.

Lest it should be thought that these considerations appea only to the comfortable classes, let me pray the reader's acceptr ance of an argument especially concerned with the poore brethren. Marriage under any conditions, monogamic, polyandrous, matriarchal, with or without facilities for spending money in legal divorce-courts, marriage in any shape or form, must perpetually serve our poor as a divine method of chastening, to teach them habits of self-control, and of patience under the most exasperating circumstances. Who, even in this age of invention, could have devised an institution which should so check and irritate to the intensest degree at the most critical times which men and women ever know? One of the two fired with desire, other potential lovers warmed with the self-same fire. The partner of each cold, perhaps ill, needing sister or brother love more than aught else in this world. What to the superficial eye would seem to be the natural solution is forbidden by ideals, religion, and the dictates of duty. Here indeed is a precious opportunity for the higher life. I confess that if it were certain that many and great advantages would redound to the nation by the expedient of abolishing marriage. I would never submit and be silent while this great field of golden virtues, where patience and self control grow in such rich profusion, found no all-sufficient substitute.

That marriage promises more than it can fulfill is a poor argument to favor its suppression. Truly, as Mistress Lillian Harman hath well observed, marriage promises protection and does not protect, and sundry young writers of real hopes, bright wit and profound judgment, upon a thorough examination have made a discovery that marriage is a sham. In answer to all which, with deference to wiser judgments, I think this rather shows the necessity for perpetuating nominal marriage among us. This is an age of commercial shams, while we have a religion in which no one believes, kings which no men honor, reverend gentlemen whom none reverence, judges who cannot judge, courts of justice where justice is unknown, fashionable intelligence which is far from intelligent, and freethinkers who are not always free and not always thinkers. How fitting then, that our institutions such as marriage should err if at all in the direction of perfect conformity to the prevailing type of sham.

And finally, if, notwithstanding all I have said, it still be thought necessary to have a bill brought in for repealing marriage, I would humbly offer a last petition to that great conservator of all our effete institutions—the theological-liberal—the secularist. Many years ago, before any of the existing schools were born, some of their ancestors were foolish enough to abolish religion. I am not blaming Ingersoll or any of his friends. I recognize their innocence of any share in that lamentable lapse from respectability.

The fascinating ear-ticklers, the cynosure of the wealthy, the idols of the five dollar sitters, the ideal family men worshipped by and worshipping all the respectabilities, I appeal to them to undo the infamous and disastrous work so ruthlessly completed before their activities commenced, by concentrating their energies on the conservation of the one last remaining product of a discredited religion.

To conclude, whatever some may think of the great advantages to human happiness by this favorite scheme, I do very much apprehend that in six months' time the income to the state by reason of registrar's fees for marriage licenses may have been reduced by at least one hundred dollars. And since that is fifty times more than the wisdom of our state ever thought fit to venture for securing the happiness of the people within the marriage bonds, there is no reason we should be at so great a loss, merely in that same interest to abolish it.

Practical Idealismin Love.

BY EGD.

No relation is virtuous unless spontaneous and self-sustaining; and this is true of the conjugal, as of others. The conjugal ideal is perfect complementation, and that complementation is pure whether simple or multiple—whether it be realized as the aggregate of certain adopted attributes in several persons, or as combined in one.

But it is natural that the complement of one person should be one other person; evidently this is in line with the principle of economy in nature; and I think that conjugal economy is the conjugial ultimate, monogamy.

I do not think that Ruedebusch can make good his claim that it is impracticable for one to find full complementation in one other. Why should it be more remarkable to find certain counterpartal qualities grouped in a complemental affinity than for certain other qualities to be integrated in the personality to be complemented? In simpler terms, where is the improbability of mates? As to "equilibration" why the solar system has its perihelion and aphelion, yet holds together; and so can the nuptial system.

I used to think that every second marriage was a mistake, either in itself, or as indicative of a previous mistake; but now it appears that conjugation may be fragmentary, or proximate—or perhaps it would be more nearly exact to say aggregate or segregate. Thus, in proportion to intensity of need and mode, proximate or victorious substitute will always be found—lacking the ultimate.

Being in philosophy what might be called a practical idealist, I must treat the problem of conjugality from this point of view. So I say, having identified yourself with this supreme ideal—perfect complementation—have faith in yourself and in your ideal; fear not to do wrong. Accept in a rational spirit the experience that comes to you, knowing that what does come to you, is yours by the law of attraction. Life is harmoniously constituted, all parts interacting equitably, so that the subjective is sure to find its correspondence and consummation in the objective. Between the two, there is congruity.

If one will guide his course by the pole-star of intuition, his bark is bound to reach the desired haven.

Banish forever the thought of impurity, for yourself, for others, for the world at large. Yet don't attempt to love for your health's sake, but for love's sake alone. Let your motive be of the highest, and then be willing to take what may gravitate to you by logical necessity. Avoid the mistake of parleying with what belongs to you, and is bound to come to you; don't bargain with your birthright. Know no necessity! Desire is its own executive. Take your rightful position, mentally; relate yourself as you will to the hierarchy of nature, and let life minister to your needs. The only way to control the extra-personal successfully is through self-control; the only way to govern the circumstance is through the centerstance.

The Way of the World.

Walter Besant.

This is the way of the world, and it is like one of the three—nay four—things which the proverbial philosopher found too wonderful for him; things which he knew not. A man proposes to found, or establish, or create, something new; something which will perhaps cause changes, small or great, in the current order and the current talk. It is immediately fastened upon and held up to derision. Nothing is so truly ridiculous as a thing which is new; besides, it makes admirable "copy." If the man kicks out in return he is jumped upon again. The world is then called upon to observe how completely the creature is squelched; how he lies flat and lifeless on the arid sand. Presently the world observes that the man, so far from being flat and lifeless, is going on just as if there had been no jumping. He bears no apparent mark of bruises; no bones are broken; there are no patches of diachylum on his head; he just proceeds quietly with his plan. Then comes another, but a fainter sound of derision, because when people do get hold of a good thing to worry they like to keep at it; but the dead man, twice killed, goes on. Then silence falls. It is unwise to let the world understand that the man you have just killed is going about alive and quite unhurt, and that the theory you have covered with contempt is flourishing like a vigorous vine, already bearing blossoms, and rich with promise of purple clusters.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

LUCIFER is unqualifiedly opposed to the practice of prostitution whether in or out of wedlock.

"THE VALUE OF QUESTIONS" is the title of the address to be delivered by M. Florence Johnson at the first meeting of the Illinois Agnostic Society, Sunday evening, January 15. See Sunday papers for place.

ARTICLES in this issue of Lucifer do not necessarily express the opinions of its editor, as he is off on a vacation endeavoring to regain his health, and during his absence a great deal of his work is done by proxy.

THE PREVAILING idea of the "sanctity of marriage" is illustrated by the women who are opposing the admission of Brigham H. Roberts of Utah to a seat in Congress because he is said to have three wives, when they know that many individual members of Congress have twice that number of concubines on the pay roll as employes in the government departments. These champions of legal marriage evidently fail to see that they are also champions of governmental support of congressmen's mistresses.

MRS. JULIA MILLS DUNN, president of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association, in a recent address in Chicago on "Our Social Peril and Its Remedy," said:

"At no time since the French revolution has there been so little regard for the sanctity of the marriage relations. Young men and young women rush heedlessly into the marital bond, knowing that if either wife or husband should desire separation for any reason the divorce courts are open. No better evidence of this statement is necessary than the instance recently recorded in the journals of the country, and recorded in a matter-of-fact way that in one of the Eastern cities was celebrated with much display of wealth, the marriage of a young woman to her sixth husband. Four of the preceding husbands acted as ushers at the wedding of their former wife, and the fifth was only prevented by illness. He sent a note of regret, and an invitation to the newly wedded pair to pass the honeymoon at his country home. It was accepted, and the comment was made again in matter-of-fact way, that the woman seemed to have a remarkable gift of retaining the friendship of her former husbands."

After some further expression of her horror Mrs. Dunn said: "We have no means at our disposal at present with which to meet this danger that threatens the republic. The remedy is to give franchise to the women."

Mrs. Dunn evidently is for the single standard as against the free coinage of husbands at the ratio of 6 to 1. But, in all seriousness, would Mrs. Dunn think more of the woman she mentions if her former husbands despised her?

To the Subscribers for "Hilda's Home."

We have been informed that some of the subscribers for "Hilda's Home" did not receive their books, notwithstanding the fact that that they had sent in the money. We are sorry that such mistakes in entry were made, and will rectify them as soon as notified. If others have failed to receive copies which were paid for, we hope they will let us know at once, and we will forward the books. We hope, also, to soon hear from those who subscribed for the book and who have not paid for it.

On the Wing.

Just a word of greeting to all who may feel an interest in the welfare of Lucifer's old editor: Leaving Chicago at 11 A. M. Tuesday, January 3, I had pleasant weather and a pleasant ride of three and a half hours to Bloomington, a thriving and beautiful little city of twenty-eight thousand inhabitants, situated near the center of the state of Illinois. Here I met with an experience entirely new to me, and one that for the time was very unpleasant, not to say exasperatingly so.

Expecting to meet our good friend Col. James Freeman at the train with his vehicle to take me to his suburban home, some two miles from the station, I was particularly anxious that no mistake should be made in regard to the right place to get off. So when I thought we must be nearing the Bloomington station I put on my hat and overcoat, set my "grip" where it would be handy, and was, as I thought and still think, on the alert to hear the name Bloomington called by the brakeman. The train halted, but no "Bloomington" reached the sensorium of my brain. Supposing the conductor would come along to take up checks I waited patiently, thinking the halt must be for the purpose of coaling or watering and was on the point of inquiring what it meant when the train started. Then the conductor made his appearance and taking the check from my hat said, "Bloomington?" "Yes," said I. "What place is this?" "The place we have just left is Bloomington."

"Why did you not call out the name sooner?" said I.

"I did call and so did the brakeman."

"I heard distinctly the call at every stop since leaving Chicago till the last, and it seems to me quite incredible that I should not hear Bloomington if called in the same way. But what am I to do? How can I get back to Bloomington?"

"There is but one way. This train does not stop till it reaches Atlanta, twenty miles south. Get off there and take the next up train, which will be at 6:13 this evening."

"And who pays for this blunder? Of course you will give me a free pass to Bloomington?"

"No. If I do it will be charged up to me. But I will see what I can do."

In a few minutes he returned and gave me a card requesting the conductor of train "17" to "carry the bearer to Bloomington—carried by. Jones." Whether he had telegraphed for orders I do not know. Arriving at Atlanta—Illinois, not Georgia, I telegraphed my friend at Bloomington, telling him of my mishap, and after patiently waiting three mortal hours was borne back to Bloomington—was met and kindly greeted by the man who bears and honors the name of Freeman, and who, though dubbed "Colonel" is eminently a man of peace and good will.

And now, Monday, January 9, after a most pleasant sojourn of nearly a week at the commodious and very hospitable home of the Freemans—Mrs. Phebe Freeman, to my sincere regret, has been absent at Chicago the entire week—I am about to take the train for St. Louis.

Of my stay at Bloomington and of my meeting with the Spiritualist Society of that place I will probably have something more to say in my next.

M. HARMAN.

Men More Merciful than Women.

Why should men be more merciful than women to the "fallen" sister?

There are doubtless many reasons for this, but the chief of them all seems to be that the "frail" woman, so-called, is a "scab," as W. T. Stead puts it. In sex relations men are the employer class and women the employed. The "scab" is one who deserts "the union" and works for less wages than the authorized "scale," or established price. The marriage certificate is woman's "union label." Marriage fixes the rate or price of woman's service sexually. That price is "support" for life.

It is true that the marriage form requires the man to promise "to love" his wife, as well as "to cherish" or support her, but to show that the obligation to love is a mere formality and not at all binding, we have only to note that the failure to love is never entered as a plea for divorce, and would certainly not be entertained as valid by any court in Christendom, whereas the most common plea or allegation on which woman asks for divorce, is "failure to support," or "desertion," which means much the same thing; thereby justifying the saying that "matrimony is simply a matter of money," at least so far as the woman is concerned; while on the part of the man the plea for divorce is commonly "unfaithfulness," "unchastity," that is, that the woman has failed to be his exclusive sex servant and has served other men; thereby showing that marriage is a matter of service, or of labor performed in the sex relation.

Do not our laws pertaining to "bastardy" or "illigitimacy" confirm this "union label" view, this commercial view of the popular standards of sex morality?

And does not this presentation of the matter sufficiently explain the well-known fact that women are more unmerciful in their treatment of the "frail sister" than are men? Naturally woman is much more tender-hearted and forgiving than is man, but in this matter of sex morality she cannot afford to be merciful; she cannot afford to be underbid. Self preservation compels her to be hard, unforgiving, unrelenting—to the woman in the case, though she easily forgives the man, and why? Is it not because man is the employer, the wage-payer, and woman the employed, the wage-earner?

And do not these views go far toward explaining why men as well as women hate the "New Woman," the self-supporting, independent, self-reliant woman? the woman who demands that all gainful occupations be opened to her, and that she be paid equal wages for equal service performed—the woman who ignores and refuses marriage as an occupation or means of support, and will neither be a "faithful, obedient wife" (a "union" woman), or a "scab" (a "prostitute") cutting under the established scale of wages?

What men want—what the employer class wants, is not that all women should be "virtuous" and subscribe to the "scale"—O, no! Their interests, their pleasures, require that there should be plenty of "scabs" to take the place, for a time at least, of the refractory "union" women!

Can anything be plainer? Most employers of labor—in agriculture, in mining, in manufactures, etc., much prefer that there should be plenty of non-union laborers from whom to draw supplies of submissive servants when their union employes "strike" for shorter hours or for a larger share of their own earnings. But the "black beast" in the estimation of the monopolistic employer is the man who is neither "union" nor "scab"—the man who insists on his right to an equal share of natural materials so that he can be self-employing—the man who will neither serve nor be served, neither rule nor be ruled. Instinctively the monopolist of nature's opportunities and of the results of human labor, fears this man worse than the devil is said to fear "holy water." He knows that the triumph of the self-owner and self-employer would mean death and destruction to his own privileged class.

And just so with the masculine employers of women in sex relations. This why the self-owning, self-reliant, independent woman is an abomination, a bete noir to our law-makers and law executors in church and state. The triumph of the principles of the new woman would mean death and destruction to the "vested rights," the time-honored privilege of man to have one wife, one "union" (respectable) sex servant, and as many "scabs" as his fancy calls for, or his money will allow him to hire.

These thoughts have been called out, mainly, by reading in the foreign correspondence column of an exchange—"New Society" I think it was—the following paragraphs:

"Pitiful scenes take place before the London Boards of Guardians, when some poor woman has to make confession of her frailty in order to obtain assistance from the Poor Law in her time of trouble. Many Boards have, with commendable humanity, referred such delicate questions to a committee of ladies. Mr. Cropper some time ago made an unavailing attempt to persuade the Hampstead Board to adopt a similar course, and last week Mr. Russell Scott reintroduced his suggestion "that no woman who is in expectation of the birth of her first child, and in consequence thereof shall apply for admission to the workhouse, or for outdoor relief, shall be required to attend in person before the Board, but that such cases shall be investigated, and be reported upon to the Board by a committee of lady guardians. The guardians were evenly divided upon the subject, but the proposal was rejected on the casting vote of the chairman.

"The principal point raised in the debate was that men were more merciful than women, and curiously enough, this view was taken by one of the lady members, Miss Brook Herford. The question, however, is not whether men or women are more merciful to women, but whether the delicacy of the question, and the natural and commendable shrinking of men from such a painful scene as the exhibition for the inspection of a roomfull of men of a young woman who has fallen from virtue for the first time, does not make it essentially one for her own sex to deal with. A girl who has fallen in her first offense against morality has probably been more sinned against than sinning; and she has not lost all sense of modesty. The main effort should be to revive whatever of modesty remains; and no pitiless exposure should blunt her feelings of shame, or make her callous, or discourage her from the hope of regaining her lost position in respectable life. Surely a better topic than this could not be found for discussion at the next Poor Law Conference. In the meantime we hope the narrowness of the vote at the Board will encourage Mr. Rider and Mr. Russell Scott to persevere in their efforts for this merciful reform."

Do not such "pitiful scenes" suggest the propriety of a revisal of our popular code of sex morality? What is "virtue," anyway, and what is "frailty?" Why should the term frailty apply to women alone, and not to man as well? As Robert G. Ingersoll says, "Let us be honest, let us be just." M. H.

The Opinion of One.

From Oswald Dawson we have received a few copies of "The Free Press Fiasco. Balance Sheet and Counter Manifesto." Mr. Dawson did not approve of the Manifesto of the Committee, and this is the result. Those who wish to read Mr. Dawson's statement may obtain a copy at this office, by sending six cents for it, or they may address Oswald Dawson, Harman Villa, Seacroft, near Leeds. For the statement of the Committee, H. Seymour, 51 Arunel Square, N., London, England, may be addressed. I do not know the price of their Manifesto, but probably six cents would cover it.

These Manifestos make rather interesting reading, but let no one suppose that the muddle over the Bedborough case is very well cleared up by them. Charges and counter-charges are made, and the root of the matter is left untouched. Only a clear and lengthy history of the matter, from George Bedborough himself could clear it up. Such a statement he does not choose to make. Indeed, to remain silent, he declares, is the only course possible to him now. He must stand before the world branded as a coward.

I wish to express my opinion on this matter once publicly. I saw the beginning of the fight and am well acquainted with the personality of many concerned. I have read all the published statements, and many private statements from Mr. Bedborough's friends and his critics, as well as from George Bedborough himself, and I must say that had I been in his place—with the circumstances as I see them, not as the public sees them—I believe that my desire for the good of the cause would have forced me to act as he acted. In other words, I am convinced from information in my possession that had he acted otherwise it would have resulted in more injury than good to the cause. And I say this in the full realization of the fact that it would be far easier for me were I to consider only myself personally, to go to prison. I have gone to prison in defense of my convictions, and I voluntarily remained there three times as long as I was condemned to stay because I refused to pay the costs of conviction. I therefore think that I may be conceded to know whereof I speak, so far as the fear of imprisonment is concerned.

This is not intended as an attempted vindication or defense of George Bedborough. It cannot be such, because I am not permitted to give the reasons for "the faith that is in me." But I have reasons that are satisfactory to me, and as for the faith, I wish, as I say, to avow it publicly.

So far as the public fight is concerned, it has not been altogether fruitless. I by no means believe that everything that is, is right or best, but I do believe that we can make good come in spite of our mistakes, even though it does not come because of them. It seems to me that there is little time or energy to be wasted in fighting among ourselves even when some of us really make grave mistakes. If we cannot work harmoniously together, there is certainly plenty of room to work separately. There is work enough, and to spare, in England for the Footes and Bedboroughs and Seymours and Dawsons and their friends and sympathizers. None need be "read out of the ranks" by the others.

LILLIAN HARMAN.

Lucifer and Politics.

Elsie Cole Wilcox mentions Mr. Lederer's suggestion that Lucifer should engage in the discussion of politics and says she does not approve of the idea. Lucifer is a political paper in the real sense of the word, but not in the narrow dictionary meaning, which is that politics is "the science of government." That definition is based on the common belief that government is necessary for the welfare of the people. As a matter of fact, politics embraces all that is needful for the welfare of humanity and the elimination of government is as much a proper object of political endeavor as any other, if there is reason to believe that government is detrimental rather than beneficial to humanity.

It follows then that "anarchist" is as much and as properly a political designation as "democrat" or "republican," and in fact it is a far more accurate designation. Republican is a word of merely arbitrary meaning when used to designate a political party. Literally a republican is a person who is interested in public things, coming from the Latin words res, things, publicæ of the public. The word republican then literally means the same as the word politician literally means, for literally a politician is one who is interested in the welfare of the citizen. To apply the word republican to a political faction is to narrow it by denying that persons not in that faction are interested in the public welfare.

So with the word democrat. The word literally means rule or might of the people; a self-contradictory term, for rule of the people means freedom of the people from rule, if it means anything.

These party names have lost any real significance and are now the badges of those who oppose politics, instead of favoring it. For politics pertains to the welfare of all the people and in that broad sense Lucifer is essentially a political paper. Its declaration of principles—its political platform—is found at the head of the editorial page of every issue. It is for light against darkness; for knowledge against superstition and credulity; for freedom of thought, word and action so far as it is consistent with equal freedom and stops short of invasion.

Lucifer has never hesitated to criticise the so-called political parties of this and other countries. It has shown that all of them in reality are striving to keep the people in ignorance and subjection instead of allowing them to assert their freedom.

Chauncey M. Depew let the cat out of the bag the other day when in a speech he said "All governments are illogical," and to save himself he added that "all progress is the result of illogical actions," an assertion the falseness of which should be apparent to any person who knows what logic is.

What Depew meant was that all progress was made in spite of the efforts made by the church and state to oppose it, or that it clearly is not the result of the teachings of so-called political leaders. As progress is inconsistent with these teachings he concludes it must be illogical, instead of seeing that the inconsistency is in the teachings rather than in the inherent tendency of human nature to strive upward in spite of restrictions.

Lucifer's specialty—sexology—is at the basis of all politics. Unless the source of humanity is properly understood and freed from contaminating influences a product of good and free men and women cannot be brought into existence. Free children can be born only of free mothers.

Woman suffrage is commonly called a political movement. But of what use to woman is the right to vote if she is not free? Women have so long been kept in ignorance that the granting of the elective franchise to them would strengthen the rule of the foes of advancement of humanity. Of course the vast majority of women would vote conscientiously, and in that very fact the evil lies, because women of today have abnormal and deformed consciences created by the church and Mrs. Grundy. With the best of intentions they would throw their influence in favor of more restrictive legislation instead of striking boldly for what they most need—freedom. The fact that more than nine-tenths of the supporters of churches and Comstockism are women is a fair indication of what women would do if they had the elective franchise.

Lucifer, if I have read its editorial utterance aright, is as much opposed to government by the votes of men as it would be to government by the votes of both men and women. The fact that all progressive movements start with a minority is sufficient proof that majority rule, if it does exist, is wrong. But it does not exist and it never did exist.

Take this country for example. The population of the United States according to the census of 1890 was 62,622,250. A majority of this population would be 31,311,126, but the total popular vote for president in 1896 was less than half this number, or 14,073,285. But the vote that elected McKinley was only 7,107,822, or a little more than one-eighth of all the people he was chosen to rule over. And yet he was not the choice of many who voted for him, but was forced upon the nominating convention by a small handful of dictators and the herd voted for him because they could not vote for the man of their choice. And this is called majority rule; a "government of the people, by the people and for the people!"

There seems more hope of freeing people from the fetichism of religion than from the fetich of government!

The Position of Mothers in Australia

"Tocsin," Melbourne.

The Full Court in the Simons divorce case decided that a wife can be said to desert her husband under certain circumstances, even though they live together under the same roof.

The society in which we live is of such a namby pamby character, so full of sham and hypocrisy and humbug, that the real issues involved in this decision will hardly be mentioned, certainly not discussed by the newspaper press.

The decision amounts to this in fact, that the woman has no right except at the cost of divorce and of losing the custody of her children, to exercise any choice as to whether she shall have any more children or not, or as to whether she will have children when she is in an unfit state, mentally or physically, to become a mother.

Involving thus, as this decision does, a denial of the right claimed, and I think justly claimed, by modern women to choose the fittest time to perform their most sacred function for themselves and forcing them, without any option, save that of losing their already born children, to become mothers against their wills, it seems to me that, correct as the decision seems to be in the law, it puts woman in a position little higher than a chattel slave, and is directly opposed to the best interests not only of women, but of that future generation, the units of which should have at least one sacred right, that of a welcome and untainted birth.

The decision is, in fact, only one of numerous indications that our institution of marriage badly needs recasting on some other than the obsolete ecclesiastico-marital-right basis; and it is sincerely to be hoped that the average newspaper reader will get rid of his or her pruriency or prudery to a sufficient extent to render possible the discussion of this subject in the press, without necessarily involving in financial ruin the paper that discusses it. The subject is one of such vital interest and importance to men and women and children of the present and future, that the embargo at present existing on discussing it is nothing less than disastrous.

Who Wants Them?

In making up volumes of Lucifer of the years '97 and '98, we find a considerable surplus of some of the numbers. No doubt our friends can use many of these for distribution. In writing to us for them, please let us know how many you can use. If you can afford to send a few stamps, they will be very acceptable. If you cannot afford to send any, do not hesitate because of that, to order. They are excellent material for missionary work and should not remain unutilized.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Dora F. Kerr, New Denver, B. C.—Please send me Dr. Greer's book, "A Physician in the House," for which I enclose $2.75. With regard to the suggested enlargement of Lucifer, we venture to give you our opinion that it is not at all advisable. It would, I believe, involve a considerable additional outlay of time and money, for which I do not see any adequate return. All that writers in Lucifer have to tell and readers are able to take in week by week can, I believe, very easily be contained in the present compass.

Amicus.—Best New Year's greetings! I hope that sickness has not overtaken you or your daughter, and that Lucifer is to be continued in 1899. At any rate, I enclose a dollar for my subscription and another dollar for "Diana," "John's Way" and "Hilda's Home." I have for years believed in the doctrines you advocate, as the only logical, practical and just outcome of a consideration of individual rights, but I had not known of Lucifer until lately, when a correspondent was so kind as to order a sample copy forwarded to me. I immediately sent for the numbers of 1898, which I have found great pleasure in reading. I approve and admire very much the brave practical stand your daughter Lillian has taken in sexual matters. I wish all of us could do the same, but family and social relations, involving the welfare of others, restrict my freedom.

Virgie C. Moon, Ponchatoula, La.—I truly hope your journey will bring you to Louisiana. I think a sojourn among the pines will do you good in mind and body. One of our Illinois comrades who was here during the holidays said he thought it a delightful place. I received the volume of Kernan's poems* several days ago. I wish people generally knew the beauty of Kernan's verse. It has a beauty of rhythm and a melody of words seldom attained by mortal man. I was rejoiced to see his poems in your list of books. Every liberal ought to own a copy, and every lover of the good, the true and the beautiful should read his words. Mr.—— reached here New Year's eve. He is good and true to our cause, but very pessimistic and easily disheartened. Things I would not notice throw him into deepest despondency. I do not like this in a reformer. I believe we should learn to take disappointment and little backsets philosophically, and if one get toppled over, just up and at it again. I believe in doing all the good we can, in every way we can; but I cannot understand why, because there is want and sorrow in the world, even though its shadow touch our own lives, we should let it sour and warp our souls. All the more need, it seems to me, that we rise above it all and keep our own souls pure, serene and sweet. Love our fellow mortals, help them all we can, and gather all the sunshine we can for ourselves and others.

*"The Flaming Meteor." By Will Hobbard-Kernan. Price $1.20. For sale at this office.

Kate Austin, Caplingers Mills, Mo.—I read Elsie Cole Wilcox's criticism of the material given the readers of Lucifer for the past year or more, and as far as I am concerned I do not see grounds for disapproval. The sentiments of the editor regarding liberty are faultless. If B. C. Walker has been a constant contributer, I have been so interested in his articles, that the frequency of his visits were not noticed.

Walker cannot be surpassed in his presentation of the vitally important problems of freedom in the sexual relations. I do not see why it is necessary that Lucifer should be a mouthpiece for all; that is impossible, and it is better to stick to the present size than to try "expansion," (a risky experiment) merely to hear all "toot their own horn." Neither the sex or name of contributor should be considered, but only the ideas presented. I find it hard to raise my subscription dues for what radical papers I take, and if they all manage to keep afloat I will be content. Last week I sent you fifty cents and an article that was more lengthy than I liked, and if you reject it, I will not be ruffled in the least, and I tell you so that you may know that not all your readers are discontented with your selections. Lillian's illustrations and comments in last Lucifer (child stealing and the death sentence of Lieutenant Wark) ought to bring home to every liberal the folly of "improving the sytem of marriage." Let the accursed thing be abolished. Yours for liberty.

Elsie Cole Wilcox, Laurence, Wash.—If I made the statement as published in No. 741, that "not a week passes that Mr. Walker is not heard from," etc., I certainly expressed more than I intended, as I am not given purposely to exaggeration. What I intended to say, and what I supposed I had said was in effect, that Mr. Walker, or one of the two or three other favored ones of Lucifer's contributors were heard from every week. Unfortunately, I kept no copy of my letter, therefore cannot say whether I was correctly quoted or not.

As I have before stated, I have no word of fault to find with Mr. Walker's articles. I should feel that Lucifer was worth one dollar a year to me if he filled all its pages. But so many have written to me urging me to write for Lucifer, and complaining of the lack of variety in its pages, that I felt it to be in the interest of the paper and the cause it represents to protest against the monopoly of its pages by a few, thus crowding out others I believed equally entitled to a hearing. However, as Mr. Harman intimates that Mr. Walker is doing more for Lucifer than the rest of us, I make no further protest, except to say that we are entitled to know the facts under the circumstances. In No. 726 Mr. Harman, after admitting that there had been, though unintentionally, a discrimination against lady writers, urges the lady readers to write for Lucifer, which is hardly fair if there is no room for their articles.

Have just received a letter from Mr. Lederer in which he says, "Lucifer must be enlarged or lots of its readers will leave it for larger space," and suggests that a wider range of subjects including politics, must be discussed. Now I see no reason in that. The country is full of political papers, and we have only one Lucifer! It seems to me that anyone who would stop reading Lucifer because it sticks to the cause for which it was born, would not be sufficiently interested in sex reform to read the parts devoted to that subject, if it once takes up other topics. If it is merely a question of making Lucifer pay, no doubt it would be better to make it a political paper all through. But if it is to work for sex reform as the basis of future advancement, it would better leave politics alone, as it certainly could contain nothing that cannot be found in the regular political papers. But lest I be accused of wishing to monopoli ze——

Ruled by the Tomb.

A Discussion of Free Thought and Free Love.

BY ORFORD NORTHCOTE.

"The world for the most part is ruled by the tomb, and the living are tyrannized over by the dead. Old ideas, long after the conditions under which they were produced have passed away, often persist to surviving. Many are disposed to worship the ancient,—to follow the old paths, without inquiring where they lead, and without knowing exactly where they wish to go themselves."—"Marriage and Divorce," R. G. Ingersoll, p. 5.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION. A discussion between Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. The opposing principles are herein stated clearly and briefly. The Challenge of "The Strange Woman."

BY JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

"Shame!" Dare you proud madam, to taunt me with shame, as you pass in your splendid array,
And frown on the wretched street wand'rer, who plods on the hot, dusty way?
You are sure of your own cold perfection, as you stand there erect in your pride;
Are, sure that no man can condemn you, with God and the world on your side!
You are fair as the bright Aphrodite; men say I am beautiful too.
They feast on my passionate kisses as the fresh morning rose on the dew.
To you they are cold and respectful, but ardent and loving to me;
They show me their strength and their weakness; the false mask is all that you see.
You greet them as honored acquaintance; you spurn me as less than the dust.
You prate of a one-sided virtue; is that what you call being just?
Aye, marvel I shrink not in silence, to think of my sin and my shame?
And kneel not in penitent meekness in the presence of your spotless fame!
True, madam, the wanton defies you, the harlot returns scorn for scorn
Nor pines for the social position your virtues so highly adorn.
We both brought our beauty to market; my sin, if a sin, is your own.
The church was your auction-block, madam; you bow to one keeper alone.
While I—bow to none! My caresses are mine to withhold or bestow.
Crouch you at the feet of your master; his plaything to hide or to show
But come not again in your splendor, to prate of repentance to me,
The child of the street is your better; though outcast, at least she is free!

Free Speech on the Social Question.

[The following paper was read before one of the Lucifer Circles. These are small clubs devoted to the free and candid expression of opinion and experience. The ideas given in the paper are so important that I have asked permission to publish it. Owing, however, to the fact that a freer expression of personal experience is admissible in a small gathering of friends than is advisable when that experience is given to the general public, the name of the writer is withheld. L. H.]

When asked to write a paper, I felt that nothing would give me greater pleasure than to comply; but what should I write about? It seemed that every topic relating to social emancipation had been presented. At last I decided to write on freedom of expression of our views.

The need of outspoken advocacy of our beliefs and the unashamed living of free lives before our acquaintances and friends and especially before and with our children.

In the popular world, men and women profess to have great respect for dead reformers, but that they would have added a thorn to the martyr's wreath had they lived in his time, is proved by their treatment of the living innovators—of the outspoken non conformists of today.

Many, for fear of being called cranks, let slip chances to do propagandistic work that they might easily do.

George William Curtis, in his oration on Wendell Phillips at the time of Phillips' death, said:

"Phillips cherished profound faith in the people, and because he cherished it, he never flattered the mob, nor hung upon its neck, nor pandered to its passion, nor suffered its foaming hate or its exulting enthusiam to touch the calm poise of his regnant soul. He moved in solitary majesty; and if from his smooth speech a lightning flash of satire or of scorn struck a cherished lie, or an honored character or a dogma of the party creed, and the crowd burst into a furious tempest of dissent, he beat it into silence with uncompromising iteration. . . Phillips did not shrink from the sternest denunciation or ridicule or scorn of those who seemed to him recreant to freedom and humanity. The idols of a purely conventional virtue he delighted to shatter, because no public energy seemed more deadly than the American who made moral cowardice respectable.

"His voice alone among the voices that were everywhere heard and heeded, challenged every word, or look or deed, that seemed to him possibly to palliate oppression or comfort the oppressor."

We need more of the moral courage manifested by Wendell Phillips. Many who call themselves advanced thinkers, fear to live their thought; and many who do live it fail to defend its principles. We do "flatter the mob" and "hang upon its neck and pander to its passion and suffer its foaming hate" to limit our expression to an extent that amounts almost to suppression of opinion, to enforced conformity and social slavery.

We can defend principles as abstract principles, can drop a word from which ideas will grow, in almost any society. When we hear persons censured for being unconventional, we can say a word in defense of freedom of action.

We are hindered in our advancement by those who propose to foist some new limitations or conformity upon us—who, for instance, propose a "system of morals" as a substitute for the "sacrament of marriage." A "system of morals" and the "sacrament of marriage" differ about as much in reality, as differ a cemetery and a graveyard. These persons do not realize that an investigator cannot afford to accept a limitation, and that we certainly do when we subscribe to creeds, sacraments or "ethics." Not until we have reached complete development are we capable of making a fixed code of ethics, and when we have reached such perfection we shall not need it.

We are so enslaved by our financial system, by our fear of employers and the fear of losing our bread and butter, that we forget that we can acknowledge our belief and life to those who believe in freedom. One reason for our fear of believers however, is that here again we are met by the "liberal" who can accept theories, but is shocked by the person who tries to prove his theory practicable.

Among my personal friends are those to whom I can advocate the freedom of love and they accept the idea, but if I point out to them a varietist, giving the names of the lovers, they are terribly shocked. They may admire each individual mentioned, but when they find that all these admirable persons love each other, aversion is shown, and "That is all I want to know about them," we are told.

Few have any conception of real freethinking. The most advanced teacher, and one of the grandest men I ever knew, said: "It is the prejudice that is shocked. The intellect cannot be shocked." I believe he was right. But just try to see how many will be shocked by an idea. From the believer in free marriage or monogamic union outside of law, who is shocked at the idea of variety, to the varietist who "believes in free love but not in free lust," on to the free speech, free press and free art advocate who hates Comstock's power for prohibiting the nude in art, but is shocked at the idea of lovers sleeping nude, we find nearly every one has a "principle on the brain" that hinders his or her development. We ought to remove as much of this prejudice as we possibly can.

Many times I astonish persons who are slurring anarchists or free lovers by telling them that I am personally acquainted with some of the leaders of thought in that field and giving them an idea of the meaning of the word as used by the advocates of the principles assailed.

In a class of literature in a school of six hundred pupils the teacher asked if such and such a thing "would lead to anarchy?" The class said "Yes." I asked the Professor to define anarchy. He looked at me in astonishment and said:

"I do not understand you."

I replied that if I knew the meaning of the word these things would not lead to anarchy; but "people have such different understandings of the word that I cannot properly answer your question without your definition."

"Would it lead to chaos?" he asked.

"Oh, yes."

At the close of the session the professor came to me for an explanation which I gave him, together with the information that the faculty were often laughed at by the anarchists who visited the school and by two or three anarchistic pupils, who thought the instructor s would do better to study the writings of the anarchists of the country before speaking of anarchy as chaos. That same week at a lecture, the President of the school used the word, and made an explanation that showed he had been informed of the talk in the literature class.

In the same school, it was said with horror, "There is a free lover in the school!"

One of the lady students who knows something of free love asked:

"Who is it? I would like to make his acquaintance; I have known a few free lovers and found them very honest, estimable people."

Such little remarks can be made and they help our work along immensely.

Persons who have lived free lives for years have blamed me for allowing my children to know my views. Before I became free enough in my mind to think a person could be quite "pure" and love more than one, a woman who was herself an illegitimate child, who was married but had a lover, thought it was "awful" that I let my children know that I believed it was right to love and express that love outside of marriage. I must not let them know that I believed in illegal love, even though it was monogamic. A man who had been a varietist all his life was surprised that I told my daughters I hoped they could be mothers, if they so desired, without being married. Members of a radical group in Boston, which is similar to Lucifer Circle, were surprised that I brought my daughter to the meeting. Yet these individuals seem honest in their opinions. I cannot understand such persons.

I brought my children into the world, and am thus responsible for their existence. I love them and want them to have all the happiness possible. The more I care for them the more I dislike to see them hindered as I was hindered by religious, political and social superstition; consequently, I never sent them to Sunday school to be taught a belief in God of which I am glad to be rid. I never taught them that anything was right or wrong simply because it was legal or non-legal, and I have felt that however much they might think my judgment at fault, they would respect my honesty, and learn enough from my experience to make it better for them to know my thought, and how it resulted in life, than to let them struggle through many trials that an honest expression of opinion and knowledge of others' experience would avert.

Parents are afraid of their children, are afraid that society will turn the child against them. In many cases it will do so but if the parent never lies to the child from the first, furnishes amusement for it outside of churches, and if the child is endowed through heredity with sincerity and honesty of purpose, society is not likely to alienate it from the parents. Even if the child may be turned from you that does not relieve you of the responsibility of trying to teach it all that you know. In after years when it learns what society means, when it learns with Emerson that "society is a joint stock company, where each man agrees for the better securing of his bread to surrender the liberty and manhood of the eater," it will understand, and having early heard your ideas will be better prepared to accept them than it would if the idea were new. At least that was my experience. My father and mother cared nothing for legal marriage. I respected them, but thought them mistaken. I married, and when I found the love gone, it did not take years of agony and sacrifice to imaginary duty, accusations of criminal conduct, and all the popular scandal and abuse to make it possible to dissolve the union. I knew what the ideas of my parents meant when they applied to my case.

If we teach our children the rightfulness of an act is determined by its effect, not what law says about it, they will by experience in life justify us if we are right. They will learn not to be shocked at the living and practical application of the principles we advocate. They will learn to face any idea without thinking it proper to be horrified because it is new or unusual.

The mind should be developed to deal not merely with isolated incidents, but with related factors of conduct; it should be so trained in scientific methods that it will not generalize from insufficient data, nor lose sight of the fundamental fact of the multiplicity of causes and effects.

When we come out boldly and show that our lives are as good and as happy outside of conventionality as they would be in it, we may expect young people to join us and help liberate the world. While we act as if ashamed, and furnish no social entertainment for them, we must expect the social element of the church propaganda to attract them, and through its attractions bind them in slavery to custom, from which it will require years of hard experience to free themselves. "If men are to wait for freedom until they become wise and good in slavery they may indeed wait forever." The only way people ever gained liberty was by taking it and defending themselves against their rulers. The fight is on now. We must educate the people, and must not hesitate to "strike a cherished lie, or a dogma of the party creed," simply because some one will call us "narrow," or "bigoted" when we object to a thing that seems to us to "palliate oppression or comfort the oppressor."

I think no one knows what is the best life, and I see no way to find out until all restrictions are removed, and every one who is brave enough is allowed to try his experiment, gain experience and give the result to the world. The idea of those calling themselves social reformers may prove to be wrong, but they should have a chance to show by results whether it is wrong or right. There may be many abuses accompanying liberty, especially until "experience has given judgment." It is hardly to be supposed, however, that in the first one hundred years of freedom the abuses would equal those caused by law in the last one hundred years.

I would not interfere with the freedom of any one who is willing to take the responsibility of his life upon himself. The moment such a person intrudes upon another, he or she is at the mercy of every lover of liberty. Each must in self defense resist the agrressor. With Phillips, I think "no public enemy is more deadly than the American who makes moral cowardice respectable."

O, Freedom, thou art not as poet's dream,
A fair young girl, with light and delicate limbs,
And wavy tresses, gushing from the cap
With which the Roman master crowned his slave
When he took off the gyves. A bearded man,
Armed to the teeth, art thou; one mailed hand
Grasps the broad shield, and one the sword; thy brow,
Glorious in beauty though it be, is scarred
With tokens of old wars; thy massive limbs
Are strong with struggling. Power at thee has launched
His bolts, and with his lightning smitten thee;
They could not quench the light thou hast from Heaven.
Merciless power has dug thy dungeon deep,
And his swart armorers, by a thousand fires
Have forged the chain; yet while he deems thee bound,
The links are shivered, and the prison walls
Fall outward; terribly thou springest forth,
As springs the flame above a burning pile
And shoutest to the nations, who return
Thy shoutings, while the pale oppressor flies.
Thy birthright was not given by human hands;
Thou wert twin-born with man. In pleasant fields,
While yet our race was few, thou sat'st with him
To tend the quiet flock, and watch the stars,
And teach the reed to utter simple airs.
Thou, by his side, amid the tangled wood,
Didst war upon the panther and the wolf,
His only foes; and thou with him didst draw
The earliest furrows on the mountain-side,
Soft with the deluge. Tyranny himself,
Thy enemy, although of reverend look,
Hoary with many years, and far obeyed,
Is later born than thou; and as he meets
The grave defiance of thine elder eye,
The nearper trembles in his fastnesses.

O, not yet
Mayest thou unbrace thy corselet, nor lay by Thy sword; nor yet, O Freedom, close thy lids
In slumber; for thine enemy never sleeps,
And thou must watch and combat till the day
Of the new earth and Heaven.

Crudities Criticised—No. 7.

BY FRANCIS BARRY.

In the Bedborough case I say: Ditto to C. L. Swartz. Let the man go to prison whose supposed duty and real pleasure is to go. It is not my place, I think, to say what Bedborough's real duty is, and I presume he knows best what his pleasure is. I shall not go to prison if I can well help it, and I shall not ask him to go. Let every man do for freedom what he is qualified to do and can afford to do.

I have not shown myself backward in taking my share of the brunt of reform work, and have, I think, earned the right to say to Bedborough: "Go to prison or stay out, as you like, and keep your standing with the best of us."

What is the difference anyway between a plea of "guilty" and a plea of "not guilty?" If Bedborough had said "not guilty," it would have been the same as saying, "I did not sell the book." Saying "guilty" was saying, "I sold the book." The only manly thing to do, if it could be afforded, was to defy the government. But how many of Bedborough's critics could afford to do that?

Let every man do what he can afford. Then let the next man do better if he can. It is a mistake, I think, to claim that animals are to be treated as men. Bedborough in failing to defy the British government was no more to blame than I was when I took "French leave" of the mob and the pack of wolves. The mobocrats were animals, the same as the wolves. I would have shot every "man" of both lots if I had been smart enough, and I would shoot the last British minion rather than go to prison, or see another man go for selling a book.

In Lucifer of December 3, a distinguished writer refers to man as sometimes disposed to tyrannize over woman. I think it is wrong to put the matter in this light. It is not men who outrage women, but husbands. Men are polite and generous and just to women. I mean men as a class, not the especially manly man. It is true that men who have not had a ceremony performed sometimes play husband, while a few who have taken the legal right to outrage a woman, act the part of free lovers. I class all men among the married who regard and treat a woman as a piece of property to be appropriated and devoted to masculine use. And I call every man a free lover who treats a woman as a self-owned equal, though he may (and sometimes properly) have indulged in a ceremony that gives him illegitimate legal power.

The habit, on the part of orators and writers, of charging men with being tyrants has been the bane of the so-called woman's rights movement. Men and women should work together as equals, those taking the lead who are best qualified without regard to sex. The woman who will work where she is not treated as an equal acts the part of a fool, and the man who will give a penny while required to take a back seat, acts the part of an ass.

As many men as women are in favor of equal suffrage and woman's freedom, and as many women as men defend marriage and the sentiment and arrangements that hold her in subjection. I have done nothing in particular for woman suffrage, and Susan B. Authony has done more than any other worker, yet I am five years her senior as its advocate, and the first person I found, or heard of, to advocate woman's right to vote was Gerrit Smith, who laid down the doctrine in the broadest and most emphatic terms in a National Convention, before any woman had spoken or a woman suffrage convention had been held. And yet the women orators would make it appear that all women were in favor of equal suffrage and all men opposed to it.

Lucifer's readers, as such, have not been greatly afflicted with vicious and senseless talk about "equal freedom." But elsewhere there has been great wear and tear of type and a great expenditure of paper and ink in advocacy of this crudity. The man who proposes equal freedom is a slanderer unless he can escape the charge by pleading ignorance of the character of freedom. Equal freedom means an equal length of rope, or it means nothing. Who is to hold the other end of the rope? When equal freedom is proposed the inference is that freedom, with no adjective, is inadmissible.

As slavery is the greatest evil, freedom without restriction is the greatest beneficence. Every man, woman and child, animal, insect and reptile has a right to absolute and unconditional freedom.

It does not require an extra intelligence to see that freedom needs no qualification. During my first lecture trip, forty-three years ago, I said wherever I went: "Freedom is not a lengthened chain, but the breaking of all chains. The freedom of one is the freedom of all. The moment I trespass in the least degree upon the least right of any being, that moment I violate freedom."

The man who advocates "equal freedom," who says, in other words, that we all ought to have an equal length of rope, needs to go to school. He doesn't know the difference between freedom and invasion.

BY ROMULUS.

The Rev. Dr. George Matheson is authority for the statement that "Christian love is the only kind of love in which there is no jealousy. The glory of Christian love is its refusal of monopoly." The gentleman is mistaken. The love of the consistent varietist, the womanly varietist, the manly varietist, is of precisely that sort. It takes strong womanhood and strong manhood to be consistent in variety. Anyone can be a varietist, but to be a consistent varietist requires every resource of heart and brain.

Not on them the poor rely,
Not on them looks liberty,
Who with frowning falsehood cower
To the wrong, when clothed in power.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, George Bedborough, Playgoers' Club, London, England.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

A REPORT of the first public meeting of the Illinois Agnostic Society should appear in this issue, but is crowded out. It will appear next week.

"'THE CHALLENGE of The Strange Woman'" is republished at the request of a subscriber, who thinks it "a most effective shot at the popular standards of respectability." It would be more effective if it were more true to life. The "Strange Woman" could be as free as pictured if she would, but in reality she is as abject a slave to supersittion as the average married woman. To both, equally, the married state is the ideal. The illustration used by the editor last week, in which he characterized the prostitute as the "non-union" or "scab," is more closely borne out by the facts. When the "Strange Woman" reaches the plane on which she no longer feels shame, when she respects herself as pictured in the poem, when she can proudly say, "My caresses are mine to withhold or bestow," she will feel too much pride, too much self-respect to sell those caresses. When that time comes she will no more be a prostitute.

On the Wing.

ST. LOUIS, Jan. 14, '99.

Sunday, January 8, at Bloomington, Ill., I had the pleasure of meeting with the Spiritualist Society of that place, of which society Col. James Freeman is President and Mrs. Hammond Secretary. The number present was not large, owing, it was thought, to the prevalence of la grippe. A very excellent paper was read by an aged member of the society—whose name for the moment escapes me—treating upon the fundamental or underlying principle of ethics in their relation to the welfare of women and men in the "here and now," rather than in their supposed relation to what are called discarnate or excarnate human beings.

At the close of the meeting the writer of these lines was introduced to the meeting by its presiding officer, in a few well-chosen words—only too flattering to the subject thereof. Without premeditation or special preparation, I gave a rough outline of the work to which the last eighteen or more years of my life have been devoted. The main purpose or theme of this impromptu address was to show that all attempts at reformation or betterment of human society as a whole, must fail so long as woman is not free—free at all times to choose and to refuse masculine co-operation, for her own happiness and unfoldment and for the endowment and right development of her offspring. To this talk my auditors listened with close attention, and at the close I had the satisfaction of receiving a few words of hearty endorsement and encouragement from the Secretary, Mrs. Hammond.

During my stay at Bloomington the weather was mainly clear and cold, but on reaching St. Louis I found the city enveloped in a dense fog—presumably much resembling that which we read of as prevailing in London in the fall and winter months. There has been no uplifting of this fog until this—Saturday—morning, when the weather-clerk was kind enough to give us a gleam of sunshine. Like Chicago and other western cities, St. Louis has for some weeks been suffering under a severe visitation of epidemic la grippe, and hence the change in the weather is hailed as an omen of good to the stricken inhabitants of the great central city of the Mississippi basin.

It is needless to say that the change is very welcome to the valetudinarian, the seeker of health and strength. Since my arrival in this city I have been taking daily treatment at the Missouri Institute of Osteopathy, Rooms 413 to 416 Odd Fellows Building, Olive and Ninth streets. Dr. J. O. Hatton, the founder of this institute, is one of the best known of the practitioners and expounders of this new and yet old method of treating diseased conditions of the human organism. Dr. Ella Slater, though not so old in the work, appears to be a very efficient condjutor in conducting the business of the institute.

To such of our readers as have not had an opportunity to investigate the claims of Osteopathy I would say that it professes to "cure all diseases without medicine." It claims that "all diseases are caused by obstructions, and that the removal of these obstructions leaves the system in a natural, that is, a healthy condition. Our methods of removing these obstructions," say these doctors, "are the newest, most scientific, most rational, as well as the most physiological known." Those wishing to know what these methods are can find out by addressing a line to Doctors Hatton and Slater at the address named above. While it is too soon to say much of my own case, I am free to state that the treatment is in line with the results of my personal experience and observation in therapeutics for the last fifty years, and that I can with a clear conscience recommend the Missouri Institute of Osteopathy to those in need of instruction in the art of right living, and of the right methods of getting well when sick.

On account of bad weather I have as yet seen but few of Lucifer's St. Louis friends. Yesterday I had a pleasant call from Professor W. F. Peck, long and favorably known as a lecturer on reform subjects. Fifteen years ago Professor Peck and Mrs. H. S. Lake were the chief speakers at our Freethought camp-meeting at Valley Falls, Kansas. Most of the readers of Lucifer have doubtless, at some time, met and heard these two pioneer workers in the Freethought field and also as evangelists in the field of economic reform. For some years Professor Peck has been located in St. Louis. Last year he was elected president of the Mississippi Valley Spiritualist Association, which organization holds its annual meetings at Mt. Pleasant Park camp ground, near Clinton, Iowa. This—Sunday—eve I expect to hear the Professor deliver a discourse upon "Abraham Lincoln" at the hall of the First Spiritualist Society of St. Louis, which society has for some months been served by him as its regular or stated speaker. On the twenty-ninth of this month he will deliver a lecture at the same place upon "Thomas Paine, the Author-Hero of the American Revolution." During February he is engaged as lecturer at the Lake Helen, Florida, encampment, which place seems now to be quite popular as a resort for winter tourists in search of health and pleasure, or of information regarding the occult, the unseen, or the hitherto unknown forces and intelligences that by many are believed to have much to do with moulding the destinies of earth's inhabitants.

A meeting of Lucifer's St. Louis friends is being arranged for Wednesday evening next at a hall near 504 Market street. Whether I shall remain in St. Louis longer than the date of this meeting is not yet decided, or whether I shall next go south, east or west. I should be very glad to accept all the invitations that have been so kindly extended to me, but neither time nor length of purse will permit such acceptance. If conditions should be favorable, I should much like to visit friends in Tennessee, Louisiana and Florida.

Tomorrow I shall probably interview the transportation companies in regard to excursion rates to Lake Helen, Fla., New Orleans and other points on or near the Gulf of Mexico, for while the weather to day in St. Louis is all that an invalid could wish probabilities are that fogs will prevail here much of the time till March, or even until April.

In the Editor's Absence.

The following fraternal letter from the editor of "The Eagle and the Serpent," London, is similar in tenor to many received at this office:

"DEAR MR. HARMAN: Sorry to hear that you are in need of a rest. But I do not wonder at it. If you will take advantage of my discovery I believe you will never want a rest. I am not the only reform editor who has found salvation in the dietetic prescriptions of Fraulein Lepper. I enclose you a circular and also send you a work of hers. Believe me you will find them worthy of your most serious consideration."

Our friends deserve and have our hearty thanks for the interest they take in my father's welfare, and their advice is, in the main, good, though sometimes rather conflicting. But the trouble with their advice is, that it does not apply to the case. Fraulein Lepper, for instance, assumes that those she advises have acted in a foolish manner dietetically, as she admits that she herself formerly did.

"I, like yourself," she says, "had been eating haphazardly. I had lost my health. Doctors, drugs and stimulants gave me no relief."

As a matter of fact, the editor of Lucifer knew all the theories which she advances, and practicalized them in so far as he thought best, long before she had arrived at that stage of loss of health. He never "ate at haphazard," for he had a sensible mother who fed her children wholesome, simple food, and after he arrived at maturity he chose his own food wisely. "Drugs and stimulants" were always avoided by him.

And now I shall say a few things about my father that Custom tells us shall not be written of our loved when living, though perfectly proper to say when they are dead. But I believe the majority of the readers of Lucifer are greatly interested in his condition, and will be glad to know some of the facts affecting and causing it.

He was born sixty-eight years ago. He is of medium height and, up to three months ago, of medium weight, not giving the impression of undue flesh, nor the opposite condition. He stands erect, despite a lameness, of which I shall speak later. His face showed very few wrinkles and his complexion was clear and fresh—a very fine complexion for a man of his age. He is slightly deaf, but his eyes look clear and bright, and earnestly into those of the one with whom he talks. He has a wonderfully thick, heavy head of white hair, with no indications of thinning with age. To one who realizes, as I do, the battle which he has been through it is wonderful—not that he needs rest now—but that he shows so little signs of age.

He was one of a large family of children. They lived in the "backwoods." As a child he read everything he could, and would study by the firelight at night after his days' work was done. He was a strong, healthy child, though thoughtful and studious. At the age of twelve he suffered an accident which injured the bone of the left leg, resulting in what the doctors then called "white swelling"—they have another name for it now which I do not recall at this moment. He suffered terribly with it, part of the time being confined to his bed in the most intense pain; and it was a constant running sore for forty-two years. A large portion of that time he was forced to walk on two crutches. At the age of sixty-four, or thereabouts, a portion of the thigh bone sloughed off and out, the sore healed and it has caused him no more suffering.

But the physical pain did not daunt his ambition. He would go to school and to college. While at the latter, he worked and earned a considerable portion of his expenses, which was a great disgrace in the eyes of his college companions, most of whom were the sons of rich southern slaveholders who thought that work of any kind was a disgrace. But this brave boy, whom I am proud to call my father, worked and suffered and studied and graduated, and finally faced the world with the education which fitted him to occupy the pulpit of a Methodist preacher.

He could not continue in that position long, however. His own reason would not permit it. Without the aid of a Freethought work, he followed his convictions and renounced his ministry. It could only have been at the cost of much suffering to him that he left the traditions of his family and took his own course unaided and alone.

The only time he ever abused his stomach, so far as I know, was when he was taking a special course of study in St. Louis after he finished his college education. He was very anxious to take this course, and having little money he nearly starved himself. The result of this was a rather serious injury to his alimentary and digestive organs; however, it did not take many years of right living to atone for that wrong.

He was too honest, too true to his convictions, to have an easy life. At the time of the abolition movement, and during the war, he had very narrow escapes from death because of his desire for freedom for all. He was threatened with mob violence and with "tar and feathers, a ride on the rail," and with death, because he expressed his abolition sentiments. And this in spite of the fact that he was a cripple and could not go to war and fight as others did.

For eighteen years it has been a constant, up-hill struggle to keep Lucifer alive. Mob violence was threatened and openly advocated, and for ten years he was harassed through the courts and was three times in prison.

For what?

For advocating the right of woman to the ownership of her person, in marriage as well as out. This was the real crime, and the object was to suppress Lucifer. The technical charge was that of publishing obscene matter; a charge most absurd as it is utterly foreign to the tenor of the paper, and to its editor's tastes and desires. All who know him know that his respect for woman and the reproductive functions is so high that he never even tells a "smutty story", nor indulges in such allusions.

My object in writing this has been to indicate that his life has been a constant struggle against fearful odds, and that it is not strange that he is somewhat weary in this, the evening of a long day. Many there are who would be more than weary. Many there are who have laid down their lives in utter exhaustion, and many more have become embittered and discouraged, with less cause than this which I have outlined. He, through it all, has continued hopeful, cheerful. He says he never felt discouraged enough to wish to die. In the words of one of his favorite poems, he can say:

"I am the master of my fate,
I am the Captain of my soul."

This, then, is the most shadowy outline of my father. I wish I could give a clear picture of him. I wish that every one of his friends could know his life as it really has been. Certainly if ever man lived a normal, wholesome life, my father is that man. He has not one of the common vices of men. His only excess has been his love of study and his work for what he believes to be right. His greatest physical enjoyments and luxuries are his morning walks, which he always takes when able, and the eating of fruit, of which he is very fond.

After his life of constant toil and mental strain, his great need is rest. When he is restored to his normal health and strength, I hope he will be able to write the story of his life. It is a task which I would like to perform if I felt equal to it, but that I do not. His life has been a wonderful help and inspiration to me, and I believe it would be to others as well.

LILLIAN HARMAN.

"MOTHERHOOD IN FREEDOM" is out of print; but James W. Adams writes us that he has thirty copies which he will donate to Lucifer. The price is five cents a copy. Send orders here, and the pamphlets will be sent you by Mr. Adams. This has been highly praised as a very valuable missionary document.

BY C. L. JAMES.

As concerns the practicability of free marriage, probably the most scientific way to reason what may be done is that which starts from what has been done. In the case of Indiana against Buel for lewd and lascivious co-habitation, the undisputed fact was, the parties had drawn up a contract which began with the assumption that they had a recognized legal right either to marry or divorce themselves, and after some declamation against marriage as it used to be, had agreed to live together except as separation might some day prove necessary. Held that this was a valid marriage, and that there was no ground of action; but court warned the prisoners that they quite misunderstoood the law and would be liable if they ever remarried after a self-granted divorce.

In the case of Minnesota against Leo Miller and Matt e Strickland, same charge, the parties having contracted to live together as long as they could agree; held, that while a valid common law marriage might doubtless be made otherwise than as directed by statute, it was evident that there must be an intention of assuming common law obligations. Verdict, "Guilty."

The case of E. C. Walker is probably better known to other readers of Lucifer than myself. I remember one peculiarity, however. The court held the marriage binding, but also punishable, which Bishop ("Marriage and Divorce") has intimated may often happen. There are no doubt other more or less similar cases not known to me. In all the above, and in what I remember of other cases whose details I do not recall sufficiently for citation, I plainly discern one thing, which is that our judges show no disposition to stretch the law in the direction of sexual freedom.

The criticism on Anarchistic doctrine and phraseology in Lucifer, No. 741, recalls to my mind a remarkable paragraph of Macauley. Answering James Mills' argument for pure democracy, Macauley observes "It might with much plausibility be maintained that in many countries there are two classes, one of whom may safely be trusted with power, while the other requires restraint—that the rich being made responsible and vulnerable by those same possessions which raise them above temptation to plunder where there is little to be got, are thereby marked as fit to exercise authority; while the poor are the class whom government is intended to restrain, because they have every immediate motive for plundering the rich; and are not amenable to any motives for refraining but the fear of punishment."

Macauley intimated at the time that he was only reasoning hypothetically, but in his last published utterance on American institutions, he made it plain that this, in one of his earliestt was founded on his sincere opinion. Though one of the most liberal among bourgeois writers, he was preoccupied with the p'atitudes of Ricardo to that extent that he could not conceive the possibiliry of poverty's being extinguished; and saw in any proposition which looked that way only an attack on those instincts of acquisition by which alone wealth is created. But whatever the limits of Macauley's vision, there was never anything foggy about it, so far as it extended. What he could see he saw with perfect clearness, and never made any bones about stating with perfect candor. That wherever the distinguishable classes of rich and poor exist, government proposes to protect the former and restrain the latter alone—that there is no law to punish a rich man, except for endangering the interest of his class, or to protect a poor man, except as the rich find it convenient—that government, thus founded on class-rule, exists in new countries only as an importation, and in old countries, after democratic changes, only as an experiment—that the idea of government by the people is illogical and must in practice lead either to despotism or anarchy; and finally, that to tell the people so may be imprudent in their masters, though it was not like himself to keep much back. All this Macauley thoroughly understood. He only failed to see that the distinction of ruler and ruled is older than that of rich and poor, being, in fact, the efficient cause of the latter.

Your correspondent represents a class—a very large class, the great majority—without whose support the vampire which sucks their blood could not exist a day, but who, fortunately for their purposes, are less intelligent. They imagine that laws are in practice equal, or pretty nearly equal, for the rich and the poor. In America they also labor under the delusion that they make the laws. They endure the evils of landlordship, chartered monopoly, gold buggery, slavery, aristocracy, etc., that they may be protected by the organization which makes these things, against the hobos and hoodlums, who are themselves among its products. The use of Anarchistic literature is obvious. It is to teach this deluded multitude by what arts they are imposed on. As for rousing the hatred of the rulers and violently shocking society, I cheerfully profess, for myself at least, that that is the very thing I would be at. Never forget Garrison's law, that the value of reform writing is measured by the abuse it brings. If it brings none, it is absolutely worth nothing. All Proudhon's other services to humanity pale before this single one that he dared to call anarchy anarchy.

Proportionate Representation.

BY C. T. B.

Equality is not predicable between different kinds of things. To say that a stone has an equal right to remain on earth as a brick is not to say that a stone and a brick are equal in use by man or other animal. To say that a mouse has a right to eat as much as an elephant is not saying that the mouse and the elephant are not equals.

To say that one mouse shall not have all that it wants to eat because another mouse has tabooed all food in sight because its great ancestor first saw the land on which the food must lie when eaten by other mice is a denial of equality.

There has never been any serious discussion of equality on the basis that if things were equal a mouse would be compelled to eat as much as an elephant could; nor that a man would be compelled to accept the diet of either mouse or elephant—in quantity or quality. Should there be equality between mice; equality between elephants; equality between men? These are the questions to be considered in discussing equality. The comparison of the rights of the mouse and the elephant is to confuse the mind so that in the statement "the rights of individuals are proportional," the mouse shall stand in the mind an individual and the elephant as an individual. That is the suppressed minor premise, in which fallacies, if present at all, are to be found. A mouse is an individual among mice—an elephant is an individual among elephants. That is, in speaking of elephants, if it be said, "the herd consists of twenty individuals" no mice are included. And one who should say, "a mouse is an individual, therefore there are some mice who are counted in the herds of elephants," would be considered, at the best, as a "cute boy."

The next false premise is easy. A man with capital is an elephant; one with no capital is a mouse. A man with skill to produce twice as much as another, is an elephant to that other, who is a mouse.

Is this true? If it is true what follows? Nothing. The question is, in an organization has any individual the right to seize raw material as fast as the individual can produce from it and so the quick producers use up the raw material before the slow ones get to it. If the raw material is inexhaustible as air (if fresh air may be said to be inexhaustible) no harm is done; but if the raw material is limited in quantity, as land, pine forests, etc., harm and injustice is done. Even our legislators can see that harm is done to the whole body—even to posterity by the destruction of the pine forests. It is custom only that prevents our seeing the injustice of seizure of land by individuals from the organization. The right of commons in England is a present demonstration of a right in land held by the whole organization, which should be enlarged to include all land, all raw material.

The philosophy in "Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXX" is crude.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXXI.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

CUMULATIVE VOTING. The equitable representation of al interests can be best secured by cumulative voting. The council is elected by the members, each member having a number of votes proportional to his contribution of labor, skill and capital; and he may give all these votes for one individual, or divide them at pleasure. So in our voting in the council, each member may divide his total number of votes at his discretion, among the different officers to be elected. The greater the extent to which cumulative voting is provided for, the more certainly will each one be able to cast his ballot in such a way as to secure to some extent what he approves.

Even cumulative voting does not secure the highest possible equity in the ballot; but a more perfect system would be more complicated. With cumulative voting, as with the present method, after a candidate has received enough votes to elect him, all additional ballots given to him are thrown away. By an absolutely perfect system, not only would the voters in such a case secure their first choice, but all the unneeded votes would assist in the selection of others.

If you should see a flock of pigeons in a corn-field, and if instead of pecking where and what is wanted, and no more, you should see ninety-nine of them gathering all they got in a heap and reserving nothing for themselves but the chaff and refuse, keeping this heap for one, and that the weakest, perhaps the worst pigeon in the flock, sitting around and looking on all winter, while this one was devouring, throwing about and wasting it, and if a pigeon more hardy than the rest touched a grain of the hoard, all the others instantly flying upon it and tearing it to pieces—if you should see this, you would see nothmore than what is every day practiced and established among men.—Dr. Paley.

Who Wants Them?

In making up volumes of Lucifer of the years '97 and '98, we find a considerable surplus of some of the numbers. No doubt our friends can use many of these for distribution. In writing to us for them, please let us know how many you can use. If you can afford to send a few stamps, they will be very acceptable. If you cannot afford to send any, do not hesitate because of that, to order. They are excellent material for missionary work and should not remain unutilized.

VARIOUS VOICES.

A. Isaak, Jr.—Enclosed find fifty cents for a paper copy of "Hilda's Home." I have read part of the story in the installments in your columns, I lost some of the numbers, and so did not finish reading it. However, I can about guess the closing of it, and it seems to me that it has the one great error which is prevalent in most books of this character. It seems to me that if the writer had left out the rich man (I have not read so far until he comes upon the scene again, but that he does I am most sure, as it takes "the happy afterward" tone which is in most books) and had taught the trials and hardships that such pioneers would necessarily have to endure, the purpose of the book would have been much better fulfilled.

V. O. Smith, Leyton, Essex, England.—"Hilda's Home" duly received, and am compelled to write to say how grand the idea is, and it seems perfectly practical in real life. But are there any "Hilda's Homes" in real existence? The description of her home is so beautiful that I am entirely carried away with the idea, and only wish there were such stately homes here for the people. It seems to me that it would do away with a few amassing all the wealth; it would practically be no use having a fortune, as there would be no outlet for it except of course in building new homes. I like the idea immensely (co-operatively working with equal sharing of dividends and shorter hours for daily toil) and sincerely trust that things may come to pass as stated in this book. What a happy, glorious existence for everybody!

F. H. Worden, Lynn, Mass.—Find enclosed fifty cents, for which please send me "Irene." Am glad to learn that the editor has got away. Hope he will get a new lease of life. Friend Walker is right in his last article. "Disquisitions upon the abstract right to do, or of doing this or that" can well be left for those who wish to study the question further, and there is ample literature in book and pamphlet form for them. And it is very possible that Lucifer could be more widely circulated and read if we had more of the records of concrete tyranny, and such short paragraphs as "Plumb-Line Penographs." These being both "newsy" and thought-provoking, would catch the eye of the indifferent, and would win subscribers who would not read abstract articles of length. As to enlargement, I think that the paper fits the times. I also enclose twelve cents for as many copies of the surplus numbers as you can send. I can use eighty or a hundred, and will remit the deficiency in postage, if any. From one who does not think he could run the paper.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium of Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

A Call. Some liberty-loving men and women who have tired of living an isolated life in the midst of a superstitious society, have decided to start a colony in the state of California and live as free a life as it is possible under existing conditions. Men and women who are free from all superstitions (especially marital) and are willing to join such a colony are requested to give their names, address and state what means they possess (the persons issuing this call do not intend to start a colony with insufficient means) to C. Shaw 43 Sheridan St., San Francisco, Cal.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

REASONS FOR PARDONING FIELDEN, NEEBE AND SCHWAB. By John P. Altgeld, Governor of Illinois. In this work the claim is conclusively proven that the prisoners did not have a fair trial, that they were unjustly condemned and that their imprisonment was an outrage and the Governor has the courage of his convictions. He does not "pardon" repentant criminals, but releases innocent victims of a judicial outrage. The history of the case is gone over from beginning to end it comprises very valuable information. Price 13 cents.

Government Analyzed. By John E. Kelso. The chapter headings are: "Derivations and Definitions of Political Terms; Various Forms of Government; General Principles of Government; Functions of Government; Origin of Government; Declaration of Independence; Articles of Confederation; Defects of the Confederation; Formation of the Constitution of the United States; Constitution of the United States; Taxation; Tariff or Protection; War; Punishments; Marriage; Religion; Prohibition; Money; What a Government Should Be." 320 pages. THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 5. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, FERBUARY 4, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 748.

The Cry of the Children.

Do ye hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears.
The young lambs are bleating in the meadows;
The young birds are chirping in the nest;
The young fawns are playing with the shadows;
The young flowers are blowing toward the west;
But the young, young children, O my brothers!
They are weeping bitterly.
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free.

Do you question the young children in their sorrow,
Why their tears are falling so?
The old man may weep for his tomorrow
Which is lost in long ago:
The old tree is leafless in the forest;
The old year is ending in the frost;
The old wound, if stricken, is the sorest.
The old hope is hardest to be lost;
But the young, young children, O my brothers!
Do you ask them why they stand
Weeping sore before the bosoms of their mothers,
In our happy Fatherland?

"For all day the wheels are droning, turning;
Their wind comes in our faces,
Till our hearts turn, our head with pulses burning,
And the walls turn in their places.
Turns the sky in the high window blank and reeling,
Turns the long light that drops adown the wall,
Turn the black flies that crawl along the ceiling—
All are turning all the day, and we with all.
And all day the iron wheels are droning,
And sometimes we could pray,
'O, ye wheels (breaking out in a mad moaning),
'Stop! be silent for today!'"

Aye, be silent! Let them hear each other breathing
For a moment, mouth to mouth;
Let them touch each other's hands, in a fresh wreathing
Of their tender human youth;
Let them feel that this cold metallic motion
Is not all the life God fashions or reveals;
Let them prove their living souls against the notion
That they live in you or under you, O wheels!
Still all day the iron wheels go onward,
Grinding life down from its mark;
And the children's souls, which God is calling sunward,
Spin on blindly in the dark.

They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And their look is dread to see,
For they mind you of the angels in high places,
With eyes turned on Deity.
"How long," they say, "how long, O cruel nation,
Will you stand to move the world on a child's heart—
Stifle down with a muffled heel its palpitation,
And tread onward to your throne amid the mart?
Our blood splashes upward, O gold-heaper,
And your purple shows your path;
But the child's sob in the silence curses deeper
Than the strong man in his wrath."

Wife and Prostitute.

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

Of course a poem is not primarily a sermon. A dramatic monologue is written from the standpoint of the supposed speaker; it is a picture, not an argument. It is a revelation of character, whether admirable or contemptible. The writer, with such imagination and poetic insight as he may possess, endeavors to express what a given individual, under given circumstances, might say for himself if endowed with the full capacity of self-revelation. The reader is to judge whether the result involves laudation, justification, pallintion or condemnation. Taking Browning as the master of this form of literary expression, we all loathe the speaker in "My Last Duchess," and perhaps admire the narrator of "The Italian in England." In subjective lyric poetry the case is different. Here the poet breathes forth the intense expression of his own feeling. No finer example of this can be given than that superb lyric by Henley, which I am delighted to see is a favorite with Moses Harman as well as with myself.

Now as to "The Challenge of the Strange Woman." Of course no reader could have taken it seriously as an apotheosis of prostitution. The "Challenge" is obviously not addressed to the champions of love in freedom, and freedom in love. We can show "a more excellent way" out of the thralldom of conventionalism and marital slavery. Every word of Lillian's comment is strictly true. None the less, the poem, although imperfect as a model of literary excellence, contains a truth not to be overlooked. The "Strange Woman" is made a social outcast by those who profit by her shame. She is spurned as a vile reptile by her haughtier sisters who sell their embraces not less openly than she. For them is the sunshine of life; for them respect and honor; for them music and poetry; for them shelter and protection; for them comfort and ease. She shrinks into the shadow as they pass by; she becomes accustomed to insult and scorn; she may enjoy a precarious tenure of luxury and pleasure during the short span of fresh beauty and youthful vigor, but an early decay is at hand. She is an unpitied martyr, perishing in the darkness without power to give expression to the inarticulate sense of wrong and injustice.

How then, can such a one be pictured as boasting of her freedom? Only in this way, and to this degree. The poem represents her "at bay," goaded by desperation and resolved to confront her contemner with plain words. She would strip the veil of hypocrisy from the woman whose prostitution was sanctioned by church and state. She can hurl reproaches in her turn. If she has degraded the expression of love she has paid the penalty. She may have been driven to prostitution, as thousands are, by such external influences as not one in a hundred could have withstood, by the crushing weight of economic injustice, by a too confiding love, basely betrayed; by a high and noble act of self-sacrifice for others. But she waives all such matters of defense or exculpation; she does not seek to justify herself, or to shrink from reaping where she had sown; but she fiercely arraigns the manifest inequality of the sentence. It does not fall to her self-righteous sister to "cast the first stone."

Both wife and prostitute dishonor the name of love, and the former has no ground for towering in conscious rectitude over the latter. Be it understood, that throughout this article I speak of the married woman who binds herself for social standing, material advantage, or other ulterior object, to a loveless union, or continues in the conventional marriage relation when love has ceased to be a reality.

Of course there are many loving hearts to whom the ceremony is a mere form, accepted for convenience or safety, and by whom the yoke of compulsion is little felt. Such are true to love, and simply follow their own judgments or consciences in the mode of expression. But the institution of marriage, as understood by church and state, is a mere matter of form and covers tenfold more prostitution than exists outside of it.

The wife leases her body to one man for life; the prostitute gives leases to various men for terms ranging from ten minutes to an indefinite number of years. The wife binds herself to a prostitution from which she is theoretically never to seek freedom; the prostitute may terminate her contract at any time, and refuse to make others. The wife, as a rule, is constantly dependent on her owner for the means of subsistence; the prostitute receives her money and spends it as she likes. The wife can never resist sexual invasion by the man who has bought her; the prostitute remains her own mistress and may deny her embraces when she will. The wife subjects her mind and will no less than her body to the orders of another, whom she allows to exercise a censorship over her visitors and correspondence, and to whom she must give account of her time and the places she is to visit. The prostitute, however deep her degradation, makes no such servile and contemptible sacrifice of her individuality, hence does not become so abject and spiritless a slave. The wife seeks to reap the fruits of her prostitution, and at the same time to pose before the world as an examplar of eminent respectability; the prostitute claims to be no other than she is.

It is clear enough that neither the wife nor the prostitute has a true conception of freedom. Of the two, the wife receives more of the world's favors, and in return therefor, accepts a cramped and straightened individuality. She becomes a hypocrite and a willing slave, using all her influence to perpetuate a system of slavery and false ideals. I do not mean to be understood as pronouncing a bitter condemnation. Too often she is rather to be pitied as a fellow-victim with her sister the "non-union" prostitute.

Freedom is a relative condition. None of us are or can be free at the present time. The only contention is that the woman who sells herself according to the sanctificed forms of marriage occupies no such exalted station as to give her the right to look with Pharisaical contempt on her less "respectable" sisters.

> For a harlot is sold for a passing hate
> But the wife is sold for aye.
> Body and soul for a lifetime sell;
> And the end thereof shall be
> That thou shalt be harlot and slave as well,
> Till death shall set thee free.

The Condition of Wisconsin Workers.

In May, 1898, occurred the strike of the woodworkers of Oshkosh, Wis. Sixteen hundred and three members of the Woodworkers' International Union "conspired" to ask of their employers, the Paine Lumber Company,

"1. For an increase of wages.
"2. For abolition of woman and child labor.
"3. For the recognition of the organization.
"4. For a weekly pay day."

The strikers were successful in their efforts, but two of their members, and Thomas I. Kidd, Secretary of the organization, who went there from Chicago to assist the strikers, were arrested and tried for conspiracy. Clarence S. Darrow of Chicago, defended them, and his speech to the jury has been published in pamphlet form.* The following extracts are from the speech:

"I say to you honestly, as man to man, that this jury cannot convict Thomas I. Kidd. You can convict yourselves, but you cannot convict him. You may return a verdict of guilty against these men, but in the face of the civilized world, and in the view of every man who has a mind to think and a heart to feel, you will write your infamy in the verdict you return. Let me say to you, gentlemen of the jury, the battle in which these defendants are engaged is your fight the same as theirs. There is not a man upon this jury but what has the same interest in these burning questions of the day as the defendant Kidd. Not one. I do not want you to mistake our position in this case. I am not appealing to you for Thomas Kidd. I am appealing to you for the stunted men, and suffering women and dependent children who cannot speak. I appeal for them, and not for him; and I say, gentleman, their lives, their future and their happiness is in your keeping as much as they were in his.....

"If there is somebody you want to get, as there always is, because most of us have enemies, excepting Paine—but if there happens to be some one you are after, then you make a charge of conspiracy, and you are allowed to prove what the defendant said and did, and what everybody else said and did over any length of time that you see fit to carry it, and there you get your conspiracy. Conspiracy is the child of the Star Chamber Court of England, and it has come down to us like most bad things and many good ones, from the remote past, without much modification. Whenever a king wanted to get rid of somebody, whenever a political disturber was in some one's way, then they brought a charge of conspiracy, and they not only proved everything he said, but everything everyone else said and everyone else did.....It was in those old days, even after courts commenced to protect the rights of individuals, they invented the crime of conspiracy. It was not only a conspiracy to kill the king, but it was a conspiracy to talk about killing him, and it was a conspiracy even for several to imagine the death of the king.....

"In many well-ordered penitentiaries outside of Oshkosh they have a rule that people cannot converse at all, and the reason is that they may not conspire. And down in the dark coal mines in the anthracite regions of Pennsylvania where those human moles burrow in the earth for the benefit of the great, monstrous, greedy corporations that are corrupting the life-blood of the nation, there they work men in chain gangs, and put an Italian, an Austrian, a German, an American and a Bohemian together so they cannot understand each other when they speak, so that they may not combine and conspire, because in combination, and in combination alone, is strength. They do this, gentlemen of the jury, so that each one of those tiny atoms, each poor laborer, with his little family, perhaps, around him, working for a dollar a day, or eighty cents a day, is bound to compete with the combination of men, with all the wealth that all their lives can create. On the one hand these powerful interests are organized thoroughly, completely and they act together; and they turn to those poor slaves, whose liberty they take, and say to them, 'We will consult with you, but come all to our office and then we will talk.' They say this because they wish to meet the weak and puny and helpless single individual with the great and powerful wealth and strength of their mighty corporations. And that is what Paine said. 'I would not answer the letter because it came from a labor organization and I did not know who it was. I will meet my men alone and talk with them. There are only two parties to a contract, the employer and the employed.' Yes, gentlemen, they would meet their men alone. Fie on you for hypocrites and cowards, who would combine every manufacturer in the city of Oshkosh, not into a 'union,' but into an 'association.' A body of employers living from the unpaid labor of the poor is an 'association.' A body of their slaves is a 'labor union.'.....

"Let me call your attention to the fact that of all the witnesses that testified in relation to wages, there was only one man who received more than a dollar and a quarter a day. Just one; and that one was the foreman, having seven under him, besides doing his own work, and he received sixteen and a half cents an hour. Aside from that, amongst the fifteen or twenty who testified, none received more than a dollar and a quarter a day, and each told instances of others who received ninety cents, eighty cents, and even less; and this has not been disputed for one moment by these men.....

"One quarter of the people who work for Paine are children and women. And these are not included in the wages quoted. You have seen some of the children; some of them came upon the witness stand. Now I personally agree with Mr. Kidd. I believe a woman should have every opportunity in this world that she wants and needs; every advantage given to a man, but it is only necessity that drives these girls into Paine's sweat shop for ten hours a day.....

"I asked Mr. Paine the question if he employed girls and he said yes. And I asked, 'What do these girls do?' 'Ah,' he says, 'those girls take little bits of sticks and saw them up on little saws.' And what is the evidence? Now I do not know whether Paine is familiar with his factory or not. Possibly he has no more interest in his factory than Quartermass has in the prosecution of criminal cases in this court; but he did not tell the truth. We proved by witness after witness that these sixteen-year-old girls take heavy doors, pine doors, hardwood doors and oak doors, and mold and saw them on the machines; and they have not denied it, excepting that Mr. Paine told you that these girls sawed little sticks on little saws. I suppose these saws scarcely moved; harmless saws that were simply toys. What these girls do has been proven over and over by the witnesses in this case.....

"What does anyone think of these little children, whom they are placing in their mills while they slowly turn their fathers out? You remember that one of those little boys told you that his father used to work, but now he is idle. Gentlemen, let these things go on, and on, and on, and the natural law of affection will be reversed—the laws which prompt the father to care for his little child, to toil for it, and labor for it, and strive for it, and give the child a few years of sunshine and happiness and joy, and a chance at public schools—those laws will be reversed, and the little child will go to the mill and leave the father to roam the streets a tramp.....

"How old are these children? We placed six on the stand and by a strange coincidence every one of the six said he was born in 1883. They were all sizes, and all shapes, and all appearances, and all ages, but they were all born in 1883, and they were all alike excepting their clothes, and every boy's clothes were poorer and shabbier than the others. But all of them were born in 1883. What does that mean? About half of those boys, under their own story, had gone into that prison at thirteen, besides two or three more who testified that they commenced at twelve or thirteen, and one told of his little sister who was working there who had commenced at twelve. All of this is undisputed. What does it mean? It means this—I suggest it for the benefit of my friend Quartermass, it means this, and this only; that when hunger is abroad in the land, when George M. Paine is paying a dollar and ten cents a day to men, it means that the fathers of these little ones are bound to make an affidavit that his child is fourteen years of age, no matter if that child is but ten. It needs no astute lawyer to see that. It is strange that Quartermass did not know it. It is queer that he could not understand it; that he could not see that the father would come to George M. Paine with the certificate in his hand, and George M. Paine would give the boy a place at a machine. I do not believe that all these six children were born in 1883. If so, 1883 was a mighty lucky year for George M. Paine. I do not know what 1884 might have brought forth for him. I suppose there is some sort of conspiracy in Oshkosh between George M. Paine and the midwives so that he may know exactly the day when a child can go into his prison cell.".....

I have given more space to these extracts than I intended, and yet have quoted a very small proportion of the most important passages. The speech as a whole is worth reading and preserving. This is a mighty problem which the workers in all trades must meet sooner or late.

By the aid of machinery the Paine Company, composed of a few individuals, has been enabled to acquire millions of dollars of wealth, while the hundreds of operators of the machines have existed on starvation wages. Labor legislation furnishes no relief, as is evidenced by that which prescribes the age at which children shall work in factories. People will always lie before they will starve. Strikes are costly and usually fail. Even where a point is gained, it is rarely of more than temporary benefit. Truly, this is the hardest problem now demanding solution.

Feeling vs. Reason.

From "Ideala."

It was a trick of Ideala's to miss the true import of a thing—often an act of her own—until the occasion had passed, or to see it strangely distorted, as she frequently did at this time—though that gradually ceased altogether as she grew older; but it was this peculiarity, so strongly marked in her, which first helped me to comprehend a curious trait there is in the moral nature of men and women while it is still in process of development. Many men, Frenchmen especially, have thought the trait peculiar to women. La Bruyere declares that "Women have no principles as men understand the word. They are guided by their feelings and have full faith in their guide. Their notions of propriety and impropriety, right and wrong, they get from the little world embraced by their affections." And Alphonse Karr says: "Never attempt to prove anything to a woman; she believes only according to her feelings. Endeavor to please and persuade; she may yield to the person who reasons with her, not to his arguments"—opinions, however, which apply to men as often as not, and only to the young, impressible, passionate, and imperfectly educated of either sex. But there is scarcely a generalization for one sex which does not apply equally to the other, so perfectly alike in nature are men and women. The difference is only in circumstance. Reverse the position of the sexes, require men to be modest and obedient, and they will develop every woman's weakness in a generation. If a man would comprehend a woman let him consider himself; the woman has the same joys, sorrows, hopes, fears, pleasures and passions—expressed in another way, that is all. But certainly, for a long time Ideala's guide was her feeling about a thing. I have often said to her, when at last she decided to take a course which had obviously been the only course open to her from the first:

"But, Ideala, why have you hesitated so long? You knew it was right to begin with."

"Yes," she would answer. "I knew it was right; but have only just now felt that it was."

She had never thought of acting on the mere cold knowledge. For feeling to knowledge in young minds, is like the match to a fire laid in a grate; knowledge without feeling being as cheerless and impotent as the fire unlighted.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE LATEST REPORT received from the editor before going to press was written Monday evening, January 31. He says that he still feels "pretty badly stuffed up with cold." In one of his recent letters he said that while he realized that rest is necessary now, it is very hard to rest when there is so much he wants to do. Now he says: "The talk last Tuesday was rather too much for my strength. Dr. Slater and others say I ought not to talk so long—in fact ought not to hold any public meetings till I am much stronger." By the time this paper reaches its readers he will probably be in the "Sunny South." If he is strong enough to make the journey, he will start Wednesday or Thursday of this week.

THE NEW MARRIAGE LAW of Ohio caused the death of a young man of that state last week. "Daniel Powell, aged twenty two, son of a wealthy farmer near Benton Ridge," is the description given by the press dispatches. He applied to the Probate Judge for a license to marry, but when asked the questions required under the new law, refused to answer. The license was denied him. Evidently he was too conscientious a believer in law to evade it, and too much in love with his sweetheart to feel able to live without her, so he "went home, swallowed a dose of poison, and then sent for his fiancee, who did not reach him until he was too near death to recognize her." Only another victim to ignorance and superstition!

At St. Louis.

It seems hard to realize that nearly a whole month has elapsed since I left Lucifer's office. Of this month, nearly three weeks have been passed in St. Louis. While my headquarters have been with Drs. Hatton and Slater at the Osteopathic Institute, Odd Fellows' Building, I have visited friends in many parts of the city. Among the pleasant surprises of which I have been the recipient is, or was, the meeting with at least half a dozen of my old Missouri pupils—of those towards whom, twenty-five to thirty-five years ago, I sustained the relation of pedagogue. Many reminiscences of the "long ago" have thus been brought vividly to mind, and the renewal of past and almost forgotten friendships are among the very agreeable incidents of my visit to St. Louis.

Of the noteworthy interviews that have been accorded to me because of my connection with Lucifer and "Our New Humanity," is one with Mr. Graham, managing editor of the "St. Louis Republic," formerly "St. Louis Republican." "The Republic," is the oldest paper, if I mistake not, west of the Alleghenies. It is now in its ninety-first year. In response to a written request I was invited to the sanctum of the autocrat of this truly venerable and very influential institution, and was listened to with respectful attention while I stated at some length the objects of our movement and made the request that space be allowed me in "The Republic" for an article setting forth our views of what we consider the basic reform now engaging the attention of thinking people everywhere. His reply, in substance, if not in words, was as follows:

"While I am in sympathy with much that you are trying to do, your request cannot be granted. I myself am called a 'crank' in regard to heredity and stirpiculture. For many years I have been collecting facts bearing upon these questions—facts drawn mainly from observation in the breeding of dogs and horses, but however much I might wish to publish the result of these observations in 'The Republic' I dare not do so. A great daily newspaper is necessarily confined to certain well-recognized lines, and the discussion of questions to which your publications are devoted does not come within these lines. To admit such subjects would result in disaster to such a paper," or words to that effect. The manner of Mr. Graham was very courteous, if not cordial, throughout the interview.

St. Louis is by far the most important city—commercially, financially, politically, historically, as well as in number of inhabitants—of the great Mississippi Valley, the largest river basin in the world, with a single exception, that of the Amazon. And while inferior in number of square miles to its South American rival, it far surpasses the valley of the Amazon in extent and variety of resources, and in adaptability to furnishing homes for a dense population of human beings. Lying, as it does, wholly within the north temperate zone, its advantages of climate are probably superior to those of any area of like size in the world. The geographical "belt of energy"—according to the famous French traveller and writer, De Toqueville—runs through the center of the Mississippi basin. This belt, according to the writer just named, lies between the thirty-eighth and forty-second degrees of north latitude as it crosses the American continent. In Europe it lies several degrees farther north, on account of the influence of the "Gulf Stream," and perhaps on account of proximity to the "Great Desert" of Northern Africa.

St. Louis is located near the southern line of this belt of energy, and therefore—in accord with the theory of De Toqueville—cannot be expected to show the energy, the enterprise, the restless haste to be rich and great that are seen in Chicago, Milwaukee, Cleveland, New York and other cities located nearer the fortieth parallel. But while its growth in population and wealth has not been so rapid as that of some of the cities named it is believed that its growth has been more healthy and substantial. Comparing St. Louis with Chicago, the traveler is apt to be impressed favorably towards the more southern city, especially as a place of residence. As compared with the great city of the lakes St. Louis has many advantages of location. The climate is milder in winter and no hotter in summer. Built upon comparatively high ground, there is no trouble in regard to drainage, such as the Chicagoans have to contend with. As a railway center St. Louis is unsurpassed. Its Union Depot has for years been known as the largest in the world. Its advantages of communication by river—north, south, east and west, are greater than those of any other city on the continent, or on the globe.

M. HARMAN.

"Homo-Culture, Race-Building."

Perhaps the most important of the incidents thus far, of my St. Louis sojourn, was a meeting and lecture at Jefferson Club Hall, 3022 Olive street, at which I played the part of chief speaker. It came about in this wise. On Thursday, January 19, I attended a meeting of the "Ethical Culture Club," which holds weekly sessions at the hall just mentioned. The subject of discussion on that occasion was "phrenology"—the speaker being a young man named Romacker. At the close of his lecture he asked that he be allowed to give a practical illustration of his familiarity with the principles of phrenology. Professor Peck, of whom I spoke in my last letter, suggested that a stranger would be a fitter subject for examination than one whose characteristics were already known to the speaker, and named the writer of these lines, without saying anything of what he himself knew concerning me. After "reading" and descanting upon my leading traits in a way that would have done credit to O. S. Fowler himself, I was asked whether I recognized the reading as sustained by my own knowledge of facts. In my reply I took occasion to say that I too had been for many years interested in phrenology and its allied sciences, including stirpiculture, heredity, sexology, etc., and that if the members of the club then present wished to hear a lecture from me I would be glad to tell them something of the results of my reading and observations in regard to this line of subjects.

This proposition having been favorably considered, a meeting was arranged for Tuesday evening of the week following. The subject, "Homo-culture, or Race-Building," was advertised in the daily papers, and in other ways, and when the evening arrived I was met by a medium-sized, but very attentive audience of both sexes. The lecture occupied about one hour and a half, the first part being devoted to the presentation of what I believed to be the chief obstacles to be overcome before real progress can be made in the matter of building a better race of human beings.

The following is a brief and very imperfect outline or synopsis of the address:

HOMO-CULTURE, RACE-BUILDING.

I. Obstacles considered. Iconoclastic or destructive work.
(a) Orthodox Theology. Mythical account of man's origin.
(b) Orthodox Government. Theocratic government.
(c) Orthodox Medication. Vicarious therapeutics.
(d) Orthodox Sexology. The marriage superstition.
II. Constructive work. The normal or scientific method.
(a) Woman's place in nature. Woman the real creator. Woman the real race builder.
(b) Man's place in nature. Man the helper, follower, not the leader or guide in race-building. Man the protector from invasion, not the dictator or ruler in social and creative functions.
(c) Co-operative helpfulness, on basis of personal self-ownership.

Owing to the lateness of the hour—ten o'clock—there was little chance for discussion, for criticisms, or reply to criticisms. Professor Peck expressed disappointment at the course the lecturer had taken. Evidently he had expected constructive work only. He was not in favor of the destruction of marriage; thought some kind of regulation necessary. Objected to what he called the "materialistic" views advanced by the lecturer—too much of the animal; too little of the spiritual, etc.

In my few closing remarks I made little attempt at reply in detail to the professor's objections. The subject of state regulation of marriage, spiritualistic as against materialistic views, etc., would require much time for intelligent presentation. I said the ground traversed by the lecture could not be properly covered in one evening, and I said that I hoped the subject would be resumed at subsequent meetings. Next day I sent a note to the professor asking him to secure for me a brief hearing before the club at its next regular meeting. His reply was as follows:

"MY DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER: Yours at hand. I agree with much you say, perhaps all of it with some qualifications. I have not time to dwell upon the matter here, however. I am as profoundly interested in this reform as any one can be, but I satisfied myself some years ago that the friends of this movement have retarded it by needless shocking of people's—well, call it prejudice.

"Further, I believe, as I said last night, that they put matter upon too materialistic a basis, and also that they go to extremes in refusing to acknowledge that any good can 'come out of Nazareth.' I can see some good, some truth in all theories.

"Regarding the meeting tomorrow p. m., I rather doubt if the club will care to discuss the question further at present, as many come for such comfort as can be gotten out of mediumship and spirit communion. You know there are many hungry souls longing for a glimpse of the possibilities of another life. I hope you will come, however, if you find it convenient to do so. I have no voice, really, in the conduct of the Thursday meetings, as they belong to the ladies' club. Fraternally, W. F. PECK."

I attended the meeting, and found the time occupied much as indicated in the letter. The meeting was opened by Professor Peck, upon the "immanence of the universal spirit." This all-pervading life-force—by whatever name it may be called, the professor maintained, is an intelligent force, a consciously intelligent force. When he sat down I asked leave to say a few words.

"With no desire," said I, "to enter into a controversy upon a matter that can be one of opinion only, rather than of proof, it seems to me the Professor's analogies would lead to difficulties hard to get over. For instance, when he says, 'I am possessed of conscious intelligence. Is it possible that the source from whence I derive my being could endow me with that which it does not itself possess?' Now," said I, "accepting this line of argument, let us ask: Brother Peck is conscious of his limitations; is the source from which he has derived his being conscious of its limitations? Brother Peck is conscious of the possession of faculties, of attributes, of special senses and organs of sense—hearing, seeing, feeling, etc.; is the all-pervading intelligence of the universe conscious of the possession of faculties, attributes and organs of sense? Brother Peck is conscious of the mental process called reasoning from cause to effect, and he knows that time and labor are required in working out intellectual problems. Does it require time and labor for the solution of intellectual problems in the mind of the 'universal intelligence?'" Pursuing this line of thought I tried to connect the speculative with the practical. I considered it of little practical consequence to us whether the life-force of the universe is consciously intelligent or not, but that it is of very great consequence to us whether the life force that creates new human beings by and through the organism of the human mother, should be enslaved by ignorance, by superstition, by human laws and by conventional customs, or whether this intelligent life-force, now incarnated in the human mother, should be free to demand and to secure the very best possible conditions and materials with which to do its work.

With this thought dimly outlined I made reference to the lecture of two evenings previous, from the same platform, but immediately it was objected that the introduction of that subject would be out of order on the present occasion.

This meeting with the Ethical Culture Club was on Thursday, January 26. I then expected to meet with it once more, as I understood an effort was being made to get another hearing for me. Since then, however, the weather has changed from comparatively warm to severely cold, and having heard nothing more concerning the matter I am left to infer that the plan has been abandoned. To-night, January 29, I expected to hear Professor Peck deliver his promised address on "Thomas Paine—his life and work," but such is the inclemency of the weather that I shall probably have to forego that pleasure. This decision seems imperative from the fact that I have not wholly escaped the epidemic disorder known as la grippe, and since my trip southward has been undertaken mainly for the purpose of regaining health and strength, I must neglect no precaution that is needful to promote that end.

With this exception, this temporary—as I hope—infliction of la grippe, I am glad to be able to report to all who may take an interest in my prospects of recovery, that I am feeling quite comfortable, and I have steadily gained in health since leaving home. I did not at first expect to stay so long in St. Louis, but meeting so many of my old-time friends, including some near relatives, added to the offer of free treatment at the Missouri Osteopathic Institute, I have yielded to these inducements and have spent a pleasant, and, I hope, not altogether unprofitable three weeks in the historic "Mound City."

Wednesday or Thursday next I expect to start for Lake Helen, Florida, stopping perhaps for a few days at Thayer, Miss., at Ponchatoula, La., and perhaps also at Jacksonville, Florida.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. By Herbert Spencer. 525 pages. Style of binding, paper, etc., similar to "Data of Ethics." Our stock of these books is small, but as long as they last we will send a copy of "First Principles" to any one sending us $1 for a NEW subscriber, and 13 cents for postage on the book.

THE GOOD YOUNG "OLD MAN" MEETS A WICKED "NEW WOMAN."

A night at sea. Brightly the full moon shines, its mellow rays broken by swiftly flying angry clouds. A great dark vessel plows its way through the water, which it churns into huge masses of white foam. Walking by twos the length of the deck, or lazily stretched in steamer chairs, looking like swathed mummies in the soft half-light, or leaning against the railing gazing at sea or sky, the men and women pass the time as best pleases them. Here are a few human beings thrown together between sea and sky for a brief space. They represent many different types and are full of interest to each other.

A woman leans over the railing, her eyes fixed idly, dreamily, on the flying, sparkling foam. Water always has a fascinating interest for her. She does not fear it, for she always hopes that when life ends, it may end in that element. She is a new woman; at any rate she seems a new type to the young man who now comes and stands beside her. He has the long hair of the poet, and the long drawl of the Southerner. He looks up to the moon, and quotes poetry about it. She, eminently and irreverently practical, silently wishes he would give her the poem and let her read it to herself—it would be such a saving of time. He is of the type of men who seem to think it their duty to "make love" to every woman they talk to; who appear to wish to be believed, but who would have no respect for the woman who might take them seriously. One day he had said to her:

"O, if only you were not married, what a sweet little flirtation we could have!"

She was amused—perhaps that was because she was easily amused—but she only exclaimed,

"Really!"

"Yes. It's too bad you are married. But couldn't we, any way? It would be just an innocent little flirtation and would hurt no one—your husband needn't even know anything about it!"

And now he, perhaps wondering what manner of woman this is who will not flirt as a careless woman will, nor be shocked or offended as a virtuous wife should, determines suddenly to drop poetry and ask a leading question:

"What is your father' name?"

"It is the same as mine—Graham. I have never changed my name."

"O, but really, you know that isn't legal. A woman must take her husband's name."

"That is where you mistake. It has been decided by judges in high courts that it is only custom that requires a woman to take her husband's name. It is not required by law."

"O, but that isn't practical, don't you know? How is any one to know that you are married if you don't take your husband's name? And if they don't know you are married it brings about such misleading situations!"

"Indeed! And how is anyone to know by your name whether you are married or single? Wouldn't it be too bad if some one should be misled into thinking you not married if you are?"

"Now you know that's an entirely different thing. But if you were my wife you'd have to take my name. I would never let my wife keep her maiden name."

"Then that alone would be sufficient reason why I should never be your wife. A man should no more wish a woman to give up her individuality in a union with him than he should be willing to surrender his individuality to her!"

The moon still shines; the vessel yet plows the waves, and the young man survives the shock. Great are the recuperative powers of Mother Nature!

Parnell—the Victim of England's Hypocrisy.

BY D. N. SWIFT.

The full story of Charles Stuart Parnell's relationship with Mrs. O'Shea would make an instructive commentary on the marriage laws and customs of civilization. Just now, however, it is more interesting to look at the light thrown on the cant and hypocrisy of English respectability by Mr. Barry O'Brien's recent biography of the great Irish leader.

American readers will probably remember that Parnell was proved guilty of adultery with Mrs. O'Shea. The Irish organs of public opinion, and even the Irish priests and archbishops were silent for some days afterward, waiting to see how events would turn. In England the Methodist leader, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the journalistic freak, Mr. W. T. Stead and Mr. Cook (Mr. Stead's successor as editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette") almost alone denounced Parnell and called on him to resign the leadership of the Irish party. Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, whose frequent attempts to rival Ananias in his own particular sphere have since made him famouse, came to the front with venom and blind rage. He spoke of the Irish as an "obscene race," and presently one after another the non-conformist clerics shouted themselves hoarse in detestation at the monster of vice who could dare to love the wife of another man.

At this juncture Mr. Gladstone wrote a public letter of excommunication against his Irish ally. The Irish deserted their leader, the bishops and priests of Ireland outshone their English non-conformist rivals in invective scorn and deadly hate, and Parnell became the sullen, irreconcilable, lonely man fighting for his own hand for the few bitter months between the divorce and his death.

Parnell is dead. Gladstone is dead, and we are now gradually getting at the facts of the case. It is established beyond reasonable doubt that so far from Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell's chief supporters being shocked at the revelation which the divorce court published, they knew of the illicit relationship between Parnell and Mrs. O'Shea for years before it became public knowledge. Moreover, the English Liberal cabinet of 1882 was in communication with Parnell with a view of forming a working alliance for political purposes. "At that time," says Mr. T. P. O'Connor, "society was ringing with the rumors of the liaison." And yet the chosen intermediary between Parnell and Gladstone was Mrs. O'Shea.

Mr. O'Connor may well say "Here was a strange and perilous state of things, the ministers using as an intermediary in negotiations of the gravest importance between them and Parnell, a lady who was not Parnell's wife. What relation did they think Mrs. O'Shea occupied to Parnell?"

Mr. W. T. Stead, with that innate distrust of his own narrowness which makes him seek for wise reasons to support a foolish position, denies that the "mere adultery" of Parnell was the cause of his bitter attack on the man. "Mr. Parnell fell," said Mr. Stead, "not because he had committed adultery, but because he deliberately laid himself out to deceive his friends." It is now abundantly clear that he deceived no one who knew him, and that if he wanted to deceive anyone he could not have been guilty of such extraordinary indiscretion as to employ Mrs. O'Shea as his trusted and sole confidential agent.

One other fact of importance is (among others) brought to light by Mr. Barry O'Brien's book. Mr. Gladstone, in explaining to Mr. O'Brien at an interview, that his public denunciation of Parnell had the support of his colleagues in the ministry, used the following extraordinary phrases.

"Poor fellow! poor fellow! it was a terrible tragedy. I do believe firmly that if these divorce proceedings had not taken place there would be a Parliament in Ireland today. Ah! had Parnell lived, had there been no divorce proceedings, I do solemnly believe there would be Parliament in Ireland now. Oh! it was a terrible tragedy."

"May I ask if you considered that Parnell should have retired from public life altogether, or only from the leadership of the Irish party?"

Mr. Gladstone: "From public life altogether. There ought to have been a death, but there would have been a resurrection. I do not say that the private question ought to have affected the public movement. What I say is, that it did affect it, and, having affected it, Parnell was bound to go. What was my position? After the verdict in the divorce case I received letters from my colleagues, I received letters from Liberals in the House of Commons and in the country, and all told the same tale. Parnell must go. All said it would be impossible for the movement to go on with him. Well, there was a meeting of the Federation at Sheffield; Morley and Harcourt were there. After the meeting they came to me and said: 'Parnell must go. The movement cannot go on with him.' I do not think that Harcourt had any convictions on the subject. I do not think that Morley had. Therefore they were unprejudiced witnesses, and their testimony coming after the testimony of the others and in corroboration of it, was irresistible. I then took action. . . Well, what was I to do under these circumstances, with English public opinion rising all the time? No resource was left me but the public letter which I wrote to Morley. Then there was an end to everything. I think Parnell acted badly. I think he ought to have gone right away. He would have come back; nothing could have prevented him; he would have been as supreme as ever, for he was a most extraordinary man."—Vol. ii, pp. 364, 365.

Mr. Gladstone may well sneer at Morley and Harcourt's absence of principle, but the sneer comes home to roost. Neither justice nor conviction had anything to do with Gladstone's "moral decision," it was a typical English calculation of the main chance. That was all.

The Jewel of Consistency.

BY EDELWYN.

Two Mormon elders are in our city and their advent is largely responsible for the meditation that leads me to write what follows:

The orthodox monogamists are very indignant against these reverend followers of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young for daring to invade this territory sacred to the use of orthodox Christians and professed monogamists. And being of an inquiring turn of mind, and having no one else of whom I could or dared ask questions, I have been propounding them to myself as follows:

First. Is this not a case of "kettle calling pot black"? Can these Methodists, Baptists and Disciples with open Bibles, engaged in instructing the children in the Sunday schools and in the church school concerning the lives of the patriarchal fathers, Abraham, Jacob, David (the man after God's own heart), the glories of Solomon, the arch polygamist of the ages, whose kingdom was kept intact and in peace by the power and blessings of God—I say, can they consistently excuse, apologize for and honor these patriarchs and extol their virtues and yet damn and persecute these, their faithful followers?

Again, how many, or it would be easier to answer how few, of these disciples of monogamy have not at some period in their lives been much worse polygamists than these Mormons? The Mormons do hold that the women with whom they have had polygamous association are honorable and respectable; they do profess to recognize the offspring of this association as their progeny and to provide for their support. On the other hand, I have never known one of these righteous monogamists to be sufficiently converted to go and hunt up a former unwedded wife or her child and try to make any reparation or render justice to them in any way.

Now I don't want it understood that I am advocating Mormon polygmy; I am only exposing the inconsistency of these Bible Christians, their disloyalty both to their creed and in their practice. I no more believe a man should have exclusive ownership—or any ownership—of two, four, sixty, or, as did Solomon, of one thousand women, than I believe he should own one. The principle, as I see it, is the same, and I do not believe in any sort of human slavery or ownership.

As for the effect on the man, on his delicacy and refinement, or feeling, I think monogamy has a much more sensual, brutalizing effect than does variety. It is as debasing as is promiscuity, and I am from observation led to believe that the most tenacious advocates of monogamy are the men who have formerly been, or are now most promiscuous in their associations. They have developed into such sensualists that the question of who their associate is bears no weight with them; all they demand is momentary gratification of a passion that has so dominated them that they are controlled by it and are insensible to any sort of repugnance that may be exhibited or felt by the other party. For them the question is, to have the power and opportunity to gratify themselves. This can better and more easily be done by owning a woman who has no legal right to refuse the demand, no matter what suffering is entailed upon her, or upon his progeny. He will keep her in submission by telling her that her soul is in jeopardy. The Bible says, "The husband is the head of the house." "Wives obey your husbands." "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord," etc. What a bonanza the violators and debauchers of womanhood have in the sacred scriptures!

Could anything be more damnable than to train up a child to believe there is a hell of eternal torture, to keep her in ignorance of all sexual intercourse until she finds herself married to some man who has not an instinct or idea above the brute, and then hold her tied in this sure-enough hell, with the everlasting hell—which is real enough to her if it is a myth—as a future penalty? Then if she decides she would prefer the one in prospect to the one she is enduring and steps out, Madam Grundy, the holy church, her own family and former friends join hands and say, "You needn't think to escape hell here, my lady," and by frowns and sneers and slanders and ostracism they render life so unendurable that the poor victim looks longingly to the "lake of fire and brimstone" for relief. I see clearly the debasing, perverting effect this system has on woman as on man, but I must wait for another time to take up that side.

A dramatic and touching suicide is reported from Southend. A young wife, only married a couple of months, finding that she and her matrimonial partner did not get on well together, put an end to her life in order to "free her husband." It was a great act of self-sacrifice, and perhaps the husband now regrets that he has lost the woman capable of making it. But the chief point is this: Our irrational law of divorce will not "free" either party to a mistaken marriage unless one of them is guilty of adultery, or the other of adultery and cruelty. Unless they degrade themselves to that extent the law affords them no relief. What God has joined together—if only like cat and dog—man must not put asunder.—"Freethinker," London.

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the innermost deep into the sinews of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1.50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN
IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS.

By Kari Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 256 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and to assure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to intrest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

What is the White Man's Burden?

BY JONATHAN MAYO CHANE.

[A poem of Rudyard Kipling, entitled "The White Man's Burden," recently published in "McClure's Magazine," is capable of two widely different constructions, but it evidently is intended to assert that the white man's burden is a duty to civilize (?) the savage.]

What is the White Man's burden
That Rudyard Kipling sings?
And what the many blessings
It to the savage brings,
As clad in heavy harness
The fluttered folk and wild
He slays with ruthless bullets—
Woman, and man, and child?

Is it the White Man's burden—
His mission proud and grand—
To veil the threat of terror
With words suave and bland;
With bible and with Hymn book,
With bullet and with ram,
To teach the sullen savage
To pray "Thy Kingdom come"?

To drive him from the forest,
Or from his native plain,
In pretence of humaneness—
In FACT for sordid gain?
To open fields for tillage,
To open marts for trade,
And fill up Mammon's chalice
With blood-wine ye have made?

Is it the White Man's burden
To fight that Money Kings
May keep from serf and sweeper
The tale of common things:
May seize the ports ye enter,
May seize the roads ye tread,
And when the battle's over
Deny you even bread?

Then bear the White Man's burden,
And reap his old reward:
The blame of those ye better,
Contempt of those ye guard.
The cry of hosts—your masters—
As if asserting right:
"Our business is to govern;
The soldier's is to fight."

Some day the White Man's burden
May grow too great to bear:
He, too, will call for freedom;
For freedom he will dare:
Not like the sullen savage
Will he be put to rout,
But he will claim his birth right,
Although so long shut out.

Then with a HUMAN burden—
Done with his childish days—
The White Man and the Black Man
With scorn of Mammon's praise,
Will battle for their Manhood,
Remembering thankless years,
Till White Man, Black and Yellow
Acknowledged are as peers.

Our English Letter.

BY D. N. SWIFT.

Don't let your American newspapers mislead you into believing that the Agapemone or Abode of Love is a genuine free love settlement on Father Noyes' lines.

The death a few days ago of Brother Prince revived an old religious scandal; that is all. Brother Prince founded a sort of monastery where human nature was to be kept within the most rigid bounds—the Divine love was to replace the sinful lusts of the flesh. Some very wealthy women joined the settlement; a considerable amount of scandal ensued. Brother Prince was accused of free love practices for very much the same reasons that very wicked men used to be called atheists—merely a meaningless term of reproach. Here is a paragraph which has appeared in all the English papers:

"AGAPEMONE OR ABODE OF LOVE.

"A Bridgewater telegraph says the death is announced at Spaxton, near Bridgewater, at the advanced age of ninety years, of Brother Henry James Prince, well-known as the founder of what is termed the Agapemone, or Abode of Love. Brother Prince was formerly a clergyman in the Church of England, as were also some of his followers, among whom were numerous wealthy ladies and gentlemen. Many of Brother Prince's adherents occupied the singular conventual establishment at Spaxton, a most luxuriously fitted up retreat, of which he had been the head since 1849. The remarkable tenet of the Princite community and their supposed mode of living were severely commented upon in Hepworth Dixon's 'Spiritual Wives,' published in 1868, and at one time the sect nearly became extinct. Some windfalls, however, are reported to have recently fallen to their lot, and about four years ago the deceased assisted in the opening of a branch at Clapton, North London, where the Ark of the Covenant, the first church of the Agapemonians, an elaborate building, seating about 500 people, was erected at a cost of some £20,000."

Rochelle Zolzman and I visited this Ark of the Covenant on Sunday evening last to hear a funeral oration in memory of Brother Prince. It was a most conventional panegyric, devoted mainly to showing that Prince was orthodox in every respect, and that all the accusations as to his morals were "inventions of the great enemy of souls."

"Prince," said the official orator, "sought all his days to crucify the flesh and to utterly and eternally suppress every fleshly desire, every carnal instinct."

Rochelle Zolzman is coming to the front. Those who care to know what English comrades are doing had better watch the progress of that enthusiastic young woman. She has just returned from an anarchistic tour of propaganda in Wales, where she has created very great interest in the sex question. Zolzman is a member of the Legitimation League, an aspirant to a dramatic career, for which she has already shown remarkable aptitude. In my opinion she has a brilliant future before her.

The reporter of the "Western Mail," Cardiff, Wales, interviewed Miss Zolzman, and the following is a portion of the interview:

There are times when an interviewer wonders whether the chief element in his work is to set up skittles to be knocked down by the person from whom he has to glean information and opinions. A "Western Mail" interviewer felt that a mission that he fulfilled on Tuesday pointed very much in that direction. The person interviewed was a Miss Zolzman. Miss Zolzman's native heath is far away at Kief, but like most other persons of Russian nationality she speaks English perfectly. She has been described as a "person of attractive appearance." Somewhat petite in stature, she is decidedly pretty—an advantage for one taking up such a propaganda as she has in hand—and a pale (but not "pasty") face is well set off with a wealth of black wavy hair, whilst when discussing all the points of her creed, she is as matter-of-fact as if the subject under consideration was a simple sum in addition. For a fortnight past she has been visiting friends in Cardiff and has been induced to attend one or two meetings held at Cardiff and Barry in defiance of Mrs. Grundy. The interview, of which the following is a report, took place on the eve of her return to London. In answer to the pressman's question as to what sect or party she belonged to, Miss Zolzman replied:

"I am an anarchist, and believe in liberty upon every question."

"And what do you lay down as the chief rule of life?"

"Simply liberty. Absolute individual liberty, without any restraint. Our socialist friends believe in a state, but their doctrine seems to be in favor of pulling down one state and building up another. Many of them believe that anarchism is bound to come. If so, what is the use of pulling down one state and building up another, and then have to undo that work?".....

"I see that you advocate the doctrine of free love?"

"Yes; but that is separate from the anarchist propaganda."

"What do you mean by it—what is your object?"

"What we say is that in the present day men and women want more light upon the sex question. We want a platform for free discussion upon the question which lies at the root of so much misery among people, especially among the lower classes. Those of us who are more advanced find that it touches us very closely."

"How are you going to regulate society? What are your aims?"

"We want to abolish conventionality and Mrs. Grundy. If a woman forms an alliance with a man without going to church she is against her, and she is absolutely unable to gain a living."

"Why do you wish to upset the existing conditions?"

"Because they are evil."

"But what are the evils of the present system?"

"In the first place, there is woman's dependence upon man. A woman is forced to marry whether she wishes to or not, and simply for the sake of the support that the man gives her, and because she cannot gain her own living. Take such a woman, and then a man who, after being in lodgings, wants a home of his own. They marry, and have six or seven children. Afterwards the man wants to get rid of the woman, but they cannot separate on account of the children. There is another aspect of the case. How can a woman feel when she is living with a man that she does not love?"

"But don't you base your arguments on exceptions?"

"No; we take the average."

"In reality, is it not a small minority of marriages that prove unhappy?"

"No. We say that the majority are unhappy."

"That is rather bold. Have you any evidence to go upon?"

"There is a great deal of evidence."

"Then taking it for granted, does not your system provoke a greater evil than the one you complain of?"

"No—at least what do you mean?"

"I was thinking of two or three possibilities. I believe that a part of your scheme is that a free union may be dissolved. Now, what do you say of the woman and children that the man leaves?"

"We want women to be economically independent of the man. A woman should not have more children than she can support herself. When a woman is as independent as a man, and able to earn her own living, she would not fear being left by the man with whom she has formed a free union. The same may be said of the man, of course, for he should not fear being left by the woman. But it is all a question for the woman. No woman need have children unless she likes. That should be a matter entirely under her control."

"Should you not tax the man with some of the responsibility of the children's maintenance? Wouldn't it be fair to ask him to bear some of the burden?"

"That needs no taxing. I should rely upon humanity. You have taxation in that direction in the present day, and yet men leave their wives."

"A very small percentage."

"Well, amongst the free love unions that I have known there has been no case as yet either way."

"Wouldn't your system break down the domestic centre idea?"

"That is what we want to break down."

"Why?"

"Simply because at present the woman is what you call domesticated, and nothing else. You get a woman who can wash and cook and do everything else in the house, and are content. The man ought to take his share of the domestic work, as well as the woman. I would leave it to the one that likes the work best."

"Isn't that rather contrary to the natural and physical ordinances? Are not women better fitted for work on the domestic side of life?"

"But some of them are not fitted, and if a woman is not fitted for the work why should she do it? Why should not man take part as well?"

"That breaks down the idea of the man being the breadwinner?"

"Yes; but so long as the man is the breadwinner and the woman dependent upon him the woman will be a slave, and have to do all that the man wants her to do. It is not by being merely a housekeeper that she can attain independence. The lot of woman under the existing system seems to me to be far from happy. She is at the mercy of her parents before marriage and at the mercy of her husband after marriage. That is not independence."

"How do you provide for the inheritance of property? In law, the children of a free union are illegitimate."

"Exactly, and the way to deal with that is for everyone to make a will. But we want to break down existing arrangements, and to make the individuals equal before everyone."

"Your doctrine of independent women seems all right up to a certain point. Young women can earn their own living in various ways. But take the case of a woman who enters into an alliance. When young she may obtain fresh situations, going from one to another, but after living with a man in a free union for, say, ten or fifteen years, she finds it practically impossible to obtain a place then?"

"That is equivalent to saying that a woman of forty or forty-five is not as well able to earn her living as a man of the same age. By establishing the recognition of the independence of woman her lot would be much easier than you imagine."

"Your system is not quite clear upon one point—the question of families. If a woman is to be entirely independent, earn her own living, and all that, what is to become of the continuance of the race?"

"People say that they love children, when all the time they say do not. They feel—especially the woman—that the children are a burden, dragging them down. The lot of the children in those long families that we see and hear about must be very miserable."

"But people that have no children are, so far as we can see, very miserable as a rule. Old maids and old bachelors are gloomy and unpleasant, compared with the appearance of married men and women with families."

"That is so in cases of absolute celibacy and abstinence."

"On the one hand you condemn long families, and, on the other hand, you speak of maintaining children. Your free unions are not merely platonic, it seems?"

"Certainly not. But we believe that, besides the attractions of sex, there should be a platonic friendship and affection overlying it. It is when the attraction is one-sided that evil results occur. Young people are attracted to each other, they know not why, are married and after a time are unhappy. They do not analyze their conditions, but as a rule, theirs is purely a sex attraction, which soon wears off. We believe in something more likely to last than that."

"But if you admit what you call the secondary attraction, how do you provide against long families?"

"That is a matter of control."

"To use plain English, a part of your creed seems to be based upon the Malthusian doctrines?"

"Yes, and we find this: A large number of children of the present day are not wanted. They are a burden and a source of misery. Now, if a child is wanted, and its existence has been thought over beforehand, its lot is likely to be one of happiness, and it will be cared for by its parents."

"The Awful Life of a Lawful Wife."

"All have been told 'Ignorance is the mother of crime,' and that no crimes are so severely punished as those committed against Nature. The courts only echo the voice of nature when they affirm:

"'Ignorance of the law does not excuse guilt.' It is these fundamental facts in the operation of natural law that make it possible for a woman who enters the marriage relation with the full sanction of the law of the land and love of her heart to be condemned to an awful life of servitude and suffering.

"Don't let her smile deceive you. She has trained herself to bear what she looks upon as part of the burden of her state.

"The underlying reason of this sad condition of affairs is ignorance. The young girl grows to womanhood ignorant of her physical needs and dangers. When a word might save her years of suffering, modesty bids her keep silent. She loves and marries and enters upon the marriage state with all its obligations to the unborn, handicapped by conditions that make life a burden to herself and a menace to her offspring.

"What can be done to correct irregularities resulting from neglect, to restore the displaced organs to a natural and healthy condition, to give back vitality to a system drained by disease, to re-attune the great harp of the nerves to divine melody after the years of discord?" It was the endeavor to answer these questions that induced a physician to advertise a patent medicine warranted to cure such ills. The title of the above, truthful and startling, ought to have hinted to its author the impossibility of medical help ameliorating the "awful life of a lawful wife." So long as she remains a lawful wife—the subservient creature which the very name implies—medicine is vain. Why should wives become diseased? Because of the general lustfulness of husbands who either ignorant or deceitful, believe that the married state gives them license to sexual abuse of their lawful wives, and because their wives, these young girls who "grow to womanhood ignorant of their physical needs and dangers," believe this also. Has not the church taught them from the "Holy Bible," "Wives submit yourself unto your husbands?" And does not all society reflect this belief upon them?

Yes, she has trained herself to bear it; she does "enter the marriage state handicapped by conditions that make life a burden to herself and a menace to her offspring." She does enter a life of "servitude and suffering."

Wives in general will admit this. Then why marry? Why become a "lawful wife?" Because of another popular fallacy, that sexual intercourse among the married is respectable—among the unmarried disreputable. Yet let us take two extreme cases, one of each side, to prove that by candid examination of facts this opinion might be changed.

Some years ago in Chicago an old roue managed to marry an innocent young girl. His apparent wealth won over the mother, and though the daughter protested that she was engaged to another the marriage was consummated. The bride was taken to a richly furnished house. During the husband's absence she was jealously guarded by being kept locked in her room. Ere long creditors demanded the house, the character of the villainous man was exposed and the greedy, deceived mother suffered the chagrin she deserved. What became of the unwilling bride? I never heard, but of course her life was ruined. This is but one case of many, yet this is lawful wedlock. Public opinion yet sustains it.

A young mechanic loved a young girl who was a music teacher. They were intelligent and not ignorant of the true ends and aims of life. They decided not to marry, but believing they needed and by right should have each other's sympathy and help, took up their abode in a neat cottage convenient to their work, which went on as before.

The unmarried wife still taught music—it was her chosen vocation; the unmarried husband still plied his trade. They were happy, industrious, useful citizens; they made no secret of the fact that they had not employed a priest to tie what God had joined together, or of their firm intention to separate when mutual love no longer formed their chief happiness. They were unmolested, for such was the beauty of the wife's character, the sturdy manliness of the husband, and the undeviating dignity and courtesy of each to the other and to all, that for once Dame Grundy was silenced and held her peace. When children came—as they did when the home became established and the pair felt it prudent—they were gladly welcomed by their loving parents and took their place as necessary adjuncts to a quiet, happy, useful household and made their way with a loving insistence that carried fallacies away before them and founded a knowledge of better conditions than had been dreamed of in their neighborhood. Yet who will say that in the former case or the latter case lies proof that extremes prove nothing? All the way between are examples of what liberty out of the marriage relation may do.

Love, virtue, industry and character justify themselves in any relation. Lust, cruelty, deceit and selfishness can never be justified in any relation—so that the law which artificially binds either in false positions works a hardship which cannot justify itself. In fact, many unthinking people take law and custom for moral leaders and measure their opinions by them instead of by the golden rule observance of nature or the application of good common sense. Yet that some of us are claiming freedom leads us to hope that ere long many more will.

ALBINA L. WASHBURN.

A Man Must Live, You Know.

A man must live. We justify
Law, shift and trick to treason high,
  A little vote for a little gold,
  To a whole senate bought and sold,
By that self-evident reply.

But is it so? Pray tell me why
Life at such cost you have to buy?
In what religion were you told
  A man must live?

There are times when a man must die.
Imagine for a battle-cry,
  From soldiers with a sword to hold—
  From soldiers with the flag unrolled—
This coward's whine, this liar's lie—
  A man must live!

OUR EDITOR writes under date of Feb. 4, from Thayer, Miss., that he made the trip safely and is very pleasantly situated with friends. "The weather," he says, "is warm and spring-like. The country is high and covered with pine timber. Water is pure and soft, and I think there is a good chance here for invalids to get well..... Thermometer at 76° in the parlor here, and no fire in the house, and been none most of the day." His cold, he says, is "still troublesome," but affects his head only. Altogether, his condition is improving.

THE CHICAGO "CHRONICLE," of Sunday, February 5, devoted half a page to an article signed "Emilius" asserting that judges in Illinois have usurped the jury's power. Lysander Spooner proved this of judges in general many years ago in a pamphlet which Benjamin R. Tucker afterwards published under the title of "Trial by Jury." The only wonder is that any modern newspaper should permit such a truthful expose of the perversion of the judiciary to be published in its columns.

DR TWING B. WIGGIN, instructor in physiology in the Chicago College of Physicians and Surgeons, was suspended last week by Dean Quine on complaint of the women students in the freshman class, who said he told offensive anecdotes to illustrate his lectures and winked suggestively at the men students. False modesty is out of place anywhere and especially so in a medical student, man or woman. But when the fact is known that the majority of the women whom Dr. Wiggin offended are trained nurses, and had never drawn the line at any serious study or discussion of physiological functions it seems reasonable to believe they were not prudes. If the doctor conducted himself as they allege he did, they were justified in complaining of what seemed to them a degradation of scientific instruction to the level of blackguardism.

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

Judge Hodge of Covington, Ky., recently granted a divorce to a woman who had been married more than thirty years and had "borne her husband"—not herself—"many children." The Judge says "the record represents a sad picture..... Had the woman in this case not been a God-fearing, Christian mother, and the record fully establishes this, she might have long ere now sought an end to her troubles in a speedier way." Truly, this is a "sad picture" which is presented to us! What can have been the conditions under which these children were born when association with her husband was so repugnant to this woman that only fear of God held her to him? She feared the "scourging rod" of her God, just as the slave-mother before the war, feared the lash of her master.

"Judge Gary cracked no jokes during the Finnegan murder trial today," we are informed by the "Daily Record" of a recent date. This is of interest in showing that the senile Judge who sentenced the Chicago Labor Martyrs twelve years ago still obstructs the path of progress. But "the old order changeth, giving place to new." A slight evidence of this is the agitation now going on for the removal of the Haymarket statue because t is an obstruction in the way of traffic. It was erected at a great expense to commemorate the Haymarket police riot. It is a large figure representing a policeman standing with uplifted hand, holding a club, and in conspicuous lettering are the words, "In the name of the people of Illinois, I command Peace!" The monument will sooner or later be removed and crumble into dust; Judge Gary will die and be forgotten; but the ever-living principles of liberty and justice for which the martyrs died will live and grow ever stronger as the years go by.

A woman writes to the New York "World" for advice. This is her condition as she states it. "I am a young married woman and have five children and am in business. My husband beats me every time he feels like it. I can't stand it any longer, so I left him two days ago. He wants me to come home." If this woman has a business by means of which she is able to support herself she is weak to an almost contemptible degree if she will submit to abuse from her husband—or any other man. It is of course impossible to judge of the entire circumstances by means of such a brief statement. There are many women in a position similar to that of this young mother. They get married and then the babies come so fast that no matter how unpleasant the conditions, they feel themselves bound to endure them. But they can at any rate point out the evils of the system to their children; they can and should teach their offspring to avoid the pitfalls into which they have stumbled. As Charlotte Perkins Stetson has Nature say:

I teach by killing; let the others learn.

It is true, as "Alamo" says, liberty may lead to "prostitution and even incest." So the liberty to bathe may lead to the wallowing in mud puddles of those whose tastes incline in that direction. Our only claim is that as a rule it is restriction in the social intercourse between men and women that makes men buy counterfeit love of women whose necessities force them to make a traffic of it. When both women and men are free, it is not reasonable to suppose that many will choose the counterfeit rather than the reality.

As to the question of variety, it seems to me a matter of no consequence whether we assume that liberty will lead to it or not. As a matter of fact, it will lead to it in some instances, and in others it will lead to exclusive relations. Both are equally deserving of respect, so long as the individuals concerned are satisfied. As a matter of fact, the word "variety" in itself expresses neither good nor bad. We may say a man has a right to choose his associates among prostitutes. Is he any more "pure" if he buys a counterfeit "love" of one woman than if he buys it of two? Is the woman any more "pure" if she sells herself to one man only, than if she sells herself to two? If friendship is good, are we of less benefit to the world if we have two friends than if we have only one? If real love is an elevating sentiment, are we less pure if we feel it for two than if we feel it for only one? If the love of a mother for a child is helpful to the race, is it a misfortune to the race for her to have two children, or does she defraud the race if she gives love and sympathy and tender care to children other than her own?

These are questions which each must answer for himself or herself, and so long as liberty to choose freely is possessed by each, I have no desire to influence the choice of any one.

I am glad to learn that "Alamo" has spent time profitably on the "mourner's bench" in learning that freedom for woman means freedom—self-ownership—not simply that she is unpossessed property which any man may rightfully take possession of. I earnestly hope it is a lasting conversion. Perhaps he will learn that that the bugaboo which he has pictured—the "variety fiend" man as he sees him—exists only in his imaginatian. He is thinking evidently, of the ordinary "man about town," who has little conception of what real love is, and who is satisfied with its counterfeit.

A Tropic Paradise.

The work of Arthur Wastall, formerly editor of "Natural Food," London, is well known to many of Lucifer's readers. It will be remembered that at the time he formed a free union with Emma Wardlaw Best (particulars of which were published in Lucifer about eighteen months ago) they started on a journey to the Seychelle Islands in the Indian Ocean, with the intention of making a home there.

Mr. Wastall writes very enthusiastically of the country and climate and prospects for making a living easily; and like some others who think they have found "a good thing" in the way of location, is anxious that others of like views may share it with him.

Of the climate he says: "You *in*temperate region folk, weltering in over 100 in the shade and withering in Arctic cold alternately, descanting upon the inconveniences and unhealthfulness of the tropics make us smile, and we can well afford to..... We are here but 300 miles from the line, and yet since our arrival I have never caught the thermometer descending below 58° or ascending above 72°; put your mind on that, mon cher! .....Paradoxical as it may seem to some, it is just because I do not relish immoderate heat that in the future I intend to keep as close to 'the line' geographically as in the field of economics, where my leanings, as you know, are all towards 'plumb-line' anarchism. You may not be aware that in Africa the coolest (not coldest) and most even temperature is to be found within the region of 5 degrees North and South latitudes. What is known as the equatorial cloud belt is chiefly responsible for this. Navigators tell me that this protective agency, although not as universal as the equator itself, is still by no means peculiar to the African continent.

"On the points of economy of time and labor, we in the 'natural home of man' will make at least three harvests, and often four or five to your one; to say naught of the far greater abundance of wild, indigenous things demanding no care or labor whatsoever. Hast thou not heard of little Easter Island in the South Pacific? Here the soil and climate are reported so propitious that a single day's labor is sufficient to raise enough potatoes to last a man a whole year. Is it really possible for one to doubt the superiority over the so-called temperate regions of lands where the cocoanut, banana and bread-fruit trees flourish, and especially as sites for colonies?..... The fruit-yielding trees here no sooner drop their produce than they are all abloom again. An oleander bush opposite me as I write has supplied our table with its lovely perfumed blossoms ever since our arrival. In this respect, unlike most things of beauty, whose fleetingness is proverbial, it is in verity a 'joy forever.'"

Mr. Wastall writes as enthusiastically as if he had found a little "heaven on earth." The only lack seems to be the society of congenial spirits. Those interested in colonization projects, who desire to learn more of the Seychelle Islands, may perhaps obtain the information by writing to Arthur Wastall, La Cascade, Mahe, Seychelle Islands.

Personally, I feel sorry that Mr. Wastall and Miss Best have gone so far away, but as is said when people go to the dream heaven in the sky, I hope that "our loss will be their gain" and that the Seychelle Islands will continue to be the paradise our friends now believe it to be.

"Prostitution and Infanticide."

From the "Rights of Women," by Karl Heinzen.

For married people and their progeny the consequences of the existing relationships of force and prostitution are truly appalling. But this same society, especially the male portion of it, never wearies of pronouncing their anathemas on freedom in love. "Free love" is a word of terror, but free prostitution has become a social institution, which is approved inside and outside of marriage by a legal license.

And shall I tell you why men condemn freedom in love? Because it would be the death of freedom in prostitution! Our male teachers, who can discourse so wisely on our nature, nowhere show their incapacity to judge of our nature more than in their anxiety that freedom will lead us whither it has led them. Give woman freedom, and she will love according to her own tastes and emotional needs; give man freedom—he already has it—without giving it to woman and he will prostitute himself according to his habit. Prostitution does not proceed from women any more than slavery does from the slave; as the latter must be charged to the oppressor, so the former must be charged to man. "Free love" for woman signifies the end of prostitution, just as free self-determination for the slave signified the end of slavery.

Years ago one of the first woman conventions took place in Rutland, in the state of Vermont. On this occasion much absurd and foolish stuff was brought up for discussion, but at the same time several women speakers created general consternation by their talent and boldness. A hitherto unknown woman attracted the greatest attention. The chief organ of the prostitution party, the "New York Herald," describes her personality thus: "She is a pale, delicate-looking woman, with a sweet, calm smile continually playing about her pretty little mouth. Nobody would suspect that such a woman could utter such sentiments as those which defiled her mouth at Rutland." The woman's name was Julia Branch, from New York. And what were the criminal sentiments by which Julia Branch so greatly incensed the moral judges of the male persuasion? Listen: "No man has a right to dictate to me where and whom I must love." This was the subject of her address. Shocking! A little woman with a pretty mouth dares to assert that no one in the world except herself can determine her love. "Free love!" Down with it!

Later a similar convention took place in Utica, in the State of New York, at which Julia Branch once more appeared. This time the chief subject of her address was "Prostitution and Infanticide." Referring to the verdict of condemnation which had been pronounced on her former speech, she said among other things, the following:

"I do not fear any public opinion or public condemnation, or I must denounce everybody, be it man or woman, as a coward, who in his heart holds a belief or principle which he dares not advocate openly before all the world. Such men do not know the meaning of the word freedom, and still have to learn the true meaning of the word slavery. True enough, it is not an easy matter to defy public opinion. I am not astonished to see strong hearts grown 'weary and weak in doing good.' It is happiness after which all the world aspires; but the way to happiness has been planted with the cross of duty, and has been made so narrow and steep that but few venture upon it unless driven by the fear of hopeless condemnation, or allured by the promise of a sparkling crown—in every case a poor recommendation for their own or the general conception of happiness.

"The ambition to become great in public opinon or to gain applause or approval of the masses, is a childish sentiment. The most faithful and noblest reformers of today as well as of all former generations, are those who have lost their 'reputation' by advocating unpopular principles. Indeed, neither man nor woman can do thorough reform work in the present state of society so long as they have not lost their 'reputation.'"

Has ever man or woman spoken nobler or prouder words than this "delicate" woman with the "small mouth" and the "sweet smile?"

She then proceeds to describe the condition of society and especially of the institution of marriage, which, above all, she holds responsible for the two evils upon which she is about to speak—prostitution and infanticide.

"I hope," she says, "that the meeting will listen to me calmly while I speak of the first evil. It is without doubt a disagreeable subject for an audience to listen to. Many of you, perhaps all, have grown up amid the limitations of false shame and false delicacy, and if a woman dares only to hint at such a subject publicly, or betrays any knowledge of it, it suffices to cast a suspicion on her own morality. But whatever may be thought of me, I openly confess that I take an interest in everything human, not excepting the woman who has abandoned the path of virtue, and who is considered a worthy representative of that place of eternal torture, to which our Christian friends mercilessly condemn her."

Is it not inspiring to hear, in the midst of this babbling and howling hypocrisy, which oppresses the minds of this pious world of scoundrels like nightmare, such noble contempt of the stupid monster, called public opinion, expressed by a "delicate" woman?

Of this dreadful pest, prostitution, which poisons both physically and morally, millions of the coming as well as the present generations of men, Mrs. Branch contents herself with unfolding a picture by means of statistical tables which she has received from physicians, especially from Dr. Sænger of Blackwell's Island. Dr. Sænger explored the city of New York under police escort and found four hundred notorious brothels with eight thousand female inhabitants. The number of frequenters of these houses, which consume some eight million dollars, he estimates at sixty thousand a day. Of the private prostitution which exceeds the public (New York is said to contain forty thousand prostitutes) Dr. Sænger could give no estimate; but in England they count one prostitute to every fourteen women (in France the proportion is said to be much worse) and on the average the unfortunates there lead this sort of life only for four years, whereupon they "marry" and become "respectable wives and mothers." For this increase the "married state" shows itself sufficiently grateful.

Mrs. Branch emphasizes the fact that five-sixths of the frequenters of houses of prostitution are married men! And how necessary present society considers prostitution to be is shown by the answer with which the Mayor of New Bedford met the request that the houses of prostitution should be abolished: "If these houses are abolished, our wives and daughters will no longer be safe anywhere—on every street they will be in danger of being insulted." (That reminds one of the worthy Mr. Stringfellow, who argued that slavery was necessary, because the female slaves were a moral lightning-rod, so to speak, for the Caucasian women).

Insulted on the street! "But," Mrs. Branch asks, "by whom would they be insulted? Not by any man outside of the world, but by somebody in the world, somebody here and there and everywhere—sixty thousand of these men are in the streets of New York daily, they meet you everywhere, their warm breath fills the air, and the purest and most modest girls are constantly brought into contact with them! Who are they? Who but husbands, fathers, brothers? Whose husband, father brother? Is it yours? Is it mine? The blood rushes into my cheeks as well as yours, at the thought that they could be our friends."

And yet, she ought to have added, each one of the sixty thousand considers himself qualified to play the part of superior moral teacher, and to condemn Mrs. Julia Branch, because she said that she alone was to decide where, when and whom she was to love. The fact that this liberty is not recognized and practiced everywhere, she considers to be the chief cause of prostitution.

"The cause lies in our present institution of marriage, which forces a man and woman to remain together until death separates them, without love, without intellectual, moral and physical harmony."

The objection, that without the present marriage bonds our sexual relations would sink into a state of anarchy, she meets with the true observation that worse conditions than the present are impossible, and that perfect liberty at its worst would create a better generation of men and women. The hypocrisy which declares that bonds are necessary to restrain those who cannot restrain themselves, and as an example mentions "Mr. So-and-So who neglects his wife," etc., she silences with the question, "How old is the youngest child of Mr. So and-So?" Answer: "Two or three months." "Does it not make one heartsick to see such degraded conditions and the wretched subterfuges behind which they are to be concealed?"

The second subject upon which Mrs. Branch spoke was infanticide. She proved by statistical statements that this crime, which has here come to be an every-day measure of expediency and correction, has increased in frightful degree. In the year 1805 the proportion in New York of still-born children to the entire population was one to sixteen hundred and twelve; in 1820, one to six hundred and fifty-four; in 1840, one to five hundred and sixteen; in 1850, one to three hundred and eighty-six. Dr. Wyne calculated that for the year 1805 there was one abortion for forty-nine births, for 1810 one in thirty-three, for 1815 one in thirty-two, for 1830, one in twenty, for 1840 one in sixteen, for 1845 one in thirteen, for 1850 one in twelve. The same physician told Mrs. Branch that the crime of infanticide had increased since 1805 four hundred and fifteen per cent. If this ratio continues, hardly a child will be born alive in New York at the end of the century. And such a population listens to condemnation of "free love" as if it still had any right to condemn anything whatever except itself! How many of the mothers of those thousands of murdered children could say of themselves that they alone were to decide where, when and whom they should love? None of the pharisees, who condemn women like Julia Branch as immoral, have ever asked themselves this weighty question.

Elmina Mounts Her Hobby Again.

Dear friends, I know some of you will smile at seeing me riding the same old hobby of "Female Superiority." But at last I have the luck to find a believer who has written a book on the subject, and a woman too—Eliza Burt Gamble. I am so pleased to see fact after fact piled heaps upon heaps in favor of the idea I imagined I held almost alone, ever since I was a school-girl studying botany, that I am just compelled to give you a few extracts from the volume.

Though I have been patient under the ridicule, mirth and irony poured out upon my advocacy of female superiority, yet I am glad of a helping hand and co-worker as educated and able as Eliza is.

You remember the groundwork of my idea was based upon the fact that Nature always works to produce a female, and that the male is merely an arrested development; that favorable conditions always produced females. With this preface I here give you some extracts from the book:

"We are given to understand that under the conditions favoring katabolism, the males among rotifera wear themselves out, under which conditions the females become katabolic enough to do without them. [Katabolic means decreasing complexity and increasing stability]. Among the common rotifers, the males are almost always very different from the females and much smaller. Sometimes they seem to have dwindled out of existence altogether, for only the females are known. In other cases, though present, they entirely fail to accomplish their proper function of fertilization, and as parthenogenesis obtains, are not only minute but useless."

The old dictionaries defined Parthenic as "pertaining to the Spartan Parthenea or sons of virgins." The later dictionaries make the meaning more in accord with facts. "The production of new individuals from virgin females by means of ova which have the power of developing without the intervention of the male element."

"Such conditions as deficient or abnormal food, high temperature, deficient light, moisture and the like, are obviously such as would tend to produce a preponderance of waste over repair—a katabolic habit of body—and these conditions tend to result in the production of males.

"Similarly, the opposed set of factors, such as abundant and rich nutrition, abundant light and moisture, favor constructive process, i. e., make for anabolic habit, and these conditions result in the production of females.

"Among the lower orders of animal life—notably insects, we are assured that an excess of females denotes an excess of formative force, and that an excess of males indicates a deficiency on the part of parents.

"In the case of bees, the queen, which is the highest development, is produced only under the highest circumstances of nutrition, while the birth of the drone, which is the lowest result of propagation, is preceded by extremely low conditions. The working bee, being an imperfect female, may not be impregnated; will however, give birth to parthenogenetic offspring—such offspring always being male."

If the queen lays virgin eggs they produce only males, when impregnated she produces both male and female eggs, and when old and feeble only male eggs. E. D. SLENKER.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXXIII.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

MUTUAL BANKING. In order that capital may co-operate with labor, it is necessary that the award to capital should be dependent upon success, corresponding to a certain amount of labor. Upon ordinary questions of the management of affairs, the interests involved are in proportion to the amount of labor, skill and capital invested. But questions may arise in which capital has a much greater proportionate interest; such as the question of the erection of new buildings, of water works or other permanent improvements or expenditures for ornamentation; for in the event of failure, capital will lose what is thus invested. Whenever such questions arise, capital should have the exclusive control. The decision what questions come into this class is vested in the council. Such questions are likely to arise most frequently in the first few years of the existence of a phalanx; and as the Council will be largely chosen by labor, it is important that the first Council should be named in the articles of incorporation, as a guaranty to those investing money, that their rights will be duly protected. Additional safety should be secured by giving to capital and to labor, each a veto power upon all propositions for the appropriation of money for purposes not previously sanctioned. Labor and skill will protect themselves by requiring an express sanction of all such expenditures as are deemed essential.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mattie Cuddie, Wathena, Kan.—Inclosed find fifty cents to pay for "Hilda's Home," paper cover, and twenty-five cents on my subscription for Lucifer. My time must have expired and I do not want to get behind or miss a single copy; it is the only reform paper I can afford to take just now, and I cannot tell you all the comfort and pleasure its weekly visits mean to me. It is large enough. If it was any larger it would not be so good, for you know "good things come in small packages," and may long live our noble, fearless little paper and its good editor is the wish of your true friend.

J. A. Allen, So. Acworth, N. H.—I wish to inform the readers of Lucifer that I am working to the full extent of my ability financially and otherwise, to get "The Harmony Co-operative Association started at this place. I have 460 acres of land which I will donate. There are three farms which join it containing about 200 acres each which can be bought cheap, which will make land enough to start with. There are also several other farms near by which can be bought at a reasonable price; enough for a colony of at least 1,000 people. We shall engage in farming, gardening, poultry raising, canning and other occupations that are suited to the ability and desires of the members. Although it is not to be expected that all the members will be interested in the same reforms as the readers of Lucifer, most of them will be interested in some reform movement.

All members will be required to sign a pledge that they will never interfere with the political, religious, anti-religious, or social opinions or practices of any member.

The object of this association is to buy land, own and operate manufactories; build homes for its members; insure protection against want or the fear of want in sickness or old age; to provide educational and recreative facilities, and to promote and maintain harmonious social relations on the basis of co-operation. Send stamp for full particulars to above address.

"Alamo," Englewood, N. J.—It must be conceded that liberty once granted, opens the way to variety, prostitution and even incest. Dare one deny it? There is no liberty less than absolute liberty. If I am free to do as I please sexually, I am free to offer my gold for sex favors to any one who will take it.

No one can say that under freedom no woman would accept nor can you prevent her, for that would not be consistent with freedom. The mistake people make is to think that because people are free to do a thing, therefore they will do it. I am free to drink, and sometimes think I should enjoy the temporary forgetfulness of trouble, or even fun of "painting the town red," but I don't; I prefer a clear brain and steady nerves.

In like manner, while I am free to degrade the sex act by making it a part of a transaction from which love is absent, I refrain, knowing it is infinitely better for the spiritual and physical man to wait until love offers its sweets.

And here, side by side with my conviction of the right of every man and woman to do as he pleases in re variety, let me record my equally firm conviction that the man who indulges in variety misses the best this life can give. His powers are his own, as also his happiness or misery; but the highest type of perfect sex intercourse is not possible without love, and I do not believe it possible for a man to love Moll, Meg, Marion and Marjory, and sometimes Jennie and Kate one after another, perhaps a week, or even a day apart. It is physical and merely so. "What God [read "Nature" if you want to] hath joined together let no man put asunder." And in true human love the spiritual and the physical are joined together. The loved being not only attracts physically, but incarnates some quality, some high virtue, some moral talent, some supreme excellence (in greater or less degree) which the lover may or may not have, but which he admires, and so also she his character.

This is the love which, by its presence, soothes pain, heals the sick, makes strong men out of weaklings, ennobles the whole being, and will, when it bends itself to procreation, produce beings of whom God ought to be proud.

Permit a word as to the "free woman" and variety. How is she free? In that she knows no one on earth who can command, "Come grant me this favor." And yet many men are quite disgusted when, meeting a woman said to be "free" they are repulsed. Comrades, of what use is her freedom if, passing from the control of one, she is at the beck of every one whose idea of freedom consists in his right to demand?

In what does her freedom consist? Some who know me may say I am "converted." Well, I've been at the "mourner's bench" quite a while and I guess I've got through, and now, realizing that man can't be any better than he will help woman to be, I am for such freedom as shall ennoble her, and through her, the whole race. Yours for "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thraldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the lancet deep into the ulcerous sores of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1.50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN

IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Kari Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 336 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women," alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. H. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Beat all sides, then doctor." 23 chapters; 479 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eyewitnesses, the threats or mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.25, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Government Analyzed. By John R. Kelso. The chapter headings are: "Derivations and Definitions of Political Terms; Various Forms of Government; General Principles of Government; Functions of a Government; Origin of Government; Declaration of Independence; Articles of Confederation; Defects of the Confederation; Formation of the Constitution of the United States; Constitution of the United States; Taxation; Tariff or Protection; War; Punishments; Marriage; Religion; Prohibition; Money; What a Government Should Be." 120 pages. Price reduced to $1.00.

With Lucifer one year to a new subscriber, $1.50.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

Labouchere on "The Brown Man's Burden."

Pile on the brown man's burden
To gratify your greed,
Go, clear away the "Niggers"
Who progress would impede;
Be very stern, for truly
'Tis useless to be mild
With new-caught sullen peoples,
Half devil and half child.

Pile on the brown man's burden,
And if ye rouse his hate,
Meet his old-fashioned reasons
With Maxims up-to-date;
With shells and dum dum bullets
A hundred times make plain,
The brown man's loss must ever
Imply the white man's gain.

Pile on the brown man's burden,
Compel him to be free;
Let all your manifestoes
Reek with philanthropy.
And if with heathen folly
He dares your will dispute,
Then in the name of freedom
Don't hesitate to shoot.

Pile on the brown man's burden,
And if his cry be sore;
That surely need not irk you,
Ye've driven slaves before.
Seize on his ports and pastures,
The fields his people tread;
Go make from them your living,
And mark them with his dead.

Pile on the brown man's burden,
Nor do not deem it hard
If you should earn the rancor
Of those ye yearn to guard.
The screaming of your eagle
Will drown the victim's sob—
Go on through fire and slaughter,
There's dollars in the job.

Pile on the brown man's burden,
And through the world proclaim
That ye are freedom's agents—
There's no more paying game!
And should your own past history
Straight in your teeth be thrown Retort that independence
Is good for whites alone.

Pile on the brown man's burden,
With equity have done,
Weak, antiquated scruples
Their squeamish course have run,
And though 'tis freedom's banner
You're waving in the van,
Reserve for home consumption
The sacred "rights of man!"

And if, by chance ye falter,
Or lag along the course,
If, as the blood flows freely,
Ye feel some slight remorse,
Hie ye to Rudyard Kipling,
Imperialism's prop,
And bid him, for your comfort,
Turn on his jingo stop.

Shall Mrs. Place Be Murdered?

BY ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

"But this I know, that every law
That men have made for man,
Since first man took his brother's life,
And the sad world began,
But strews the wheat and saves the chaff
With a most evil fan."

Ezra H. Heywood once wrote, "Sex ignorance pollutes and blasts life which sex knowledge would ennoble." No demonstration of the necessity of more general education as to the natural processes of life, as to the sex relations, and as to marriage could be more cogent than that furnished by Mrs. Place, which is attracting attention in New York, where she has been convicted of murder and is now under sentence of death. While many are clamoring for her execution, as the old Jews did for the death of Christ, and many more are urging a commutation of her sentence on sentimental grounds, the real fact that she was insane and not responsible for her acts is lost sight of and the whole community is in a state of besotted ignorance as to what is really the matter. The plea of insanity was not made upon her trial, nor was there any suggestion of such a defense, so that the mere facts were submitted to a jury of simpletons who had no conception of the significance of those facts, and conviction was easier for them than intelligent thought upon the subject.

It appears that Mrs. Place is forty-five years old, which fact of itself should excite scrutinizing inquiry into her mental condition at the time of her murderous act. She had supported herself by dress-making up to the time of her marriage with Mr. Place in November, 1893. Mr. and Mrs. Place and Ida, his daughter by a former marriage, the murdered victim, constituted the family, and they lived harmoniously for about a year, when dissensions arose. By the close of 1895 Mrs. Place's petulancy became so aggravated that she discharged the servant and paid no attention to her husband's needs nor to the care of the house. She had severe headaches every two or three months, and such suggestive actions are attributed to her as drinking part of a glass of lemonade and throwing the rest out of the window, repeating the process a number of times. This morbid condition grew upon her so that she indulged in such pranks as hiding Ida's clothing, and at one time she destroyed Ida's hat. Conditions in the Place household were such as might very likely have operated upon a morbidly sensitive person at the age of Mrs. Place to induce insanity; and a strong confirmation of the suspicion that she was insane was found in the fact that at the time of her arrest and examination when everybody at the station house was in a high state of excitement she was cool and collected. She complained much of her head, and said that she had so much trouble with her husband. She seemed free from remorse, as insane murderers usually are, and she now says she has no recollection of the fatal occurrence.

The facts bring this case within the limits of a class of cases which has been too superficially treated by the courts, and too revengefully dealt with by the people. Scientific inquiry would have shown the similarity of this case with many cases described in books such as that of Mrs. Druse (see "Medico-Legal Journal," June, 1887), Mrs. Whiteling and Mrs. Barrows (Id. March, 1888) and Mrs. Lebkuchner (Id. June, 1889).

Ray, in his "Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity," section 248, says: "Another curious form of homicidal insanity occurs in women, and seems to be connected with those changes in the system produced by menstruation and lactation. It is a little remarkable that with a few exceptions, the victim selected by the patient is always her own or some other child."

The feelings of the patient in such a case are graphically described by Dr. Oxner thus: "A worthy neighbor told me during treatment for 'change of life,' that sometimes when things went wrong with her she felt as if she could tear God from his throne, but this is so long ago she has forgotten it." And he further says: "While thousands go over safely amid comparatively happy surroundings, now and again one dies, oftener they become broken in health, while some under constant domestic bickerings become insane and never recover; others, under like unhappy circumstances, become desperately insane and their mania spends its force in some desperate deed to their eternal regret."

And now the mischievous psychological influences which inevitably attend the public discussion of a murder case must be turned loose upon the community to sow seeds of a new crop of murders, and we are threatened with a deliberate official killing of a most unfortunate woman whereby an authoritative example of murder is set before the people, and all because this woman and her family, and her judge and her jury lacked that sex knowledge which ennobles life.

Chivalry, Factories and the Birthrate.

BY R. B. KERR.

From Mr. James' last article I see that our dispute about chivalry is merely a verbal one. By "chivalry" he says he means a medieval virtue which still exists to some extent in Germany and Austria, but is quite obsolete in America. Very evidently he ad I do not mean the same thing. By "chivalry" I mean a special consideration which men show to women as women, without expecting a like consideration in return. To take a minor instance, many a man will give up his seat in a street car to a woman whom he does not expect ever to see again, merely because she is a woman. This sort of thing is somewhat rare in Germany and Austria, except among the highest classes; but in America it is found among all classes, and is in fact the feature of the national life which most impresses foreigners, no matter where they come from.

Mr. James thinks that the high position of women in the nineteenth century and in America, is due to their employment in factories. But unfortunately, the theory will not explain the phenomena. The three countries in which women are most employed in factories are the three great manufacturing nations, Germany, England and the United States. But Mr. James and I are agreed that one of these countries, Germany, is notorious among the nations for the low position held by its women. Of the other two, England is the older manufacturing nation, and has the larger percentage of manufacturing population; but the position of women is higher in the United States.

While I certainly give some importance to the cause mentioned by Mr. James, I ascribe the high position now occupied by women mainly to the great spread of sympathy and consideration for the weak which has been such a wonderful characteristic of the nineteenth century. I believe that women owe their emancipation chiefly to the same causes which have called into being innumerable societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals, the suppression of vivisection, the rescue of drunkards and prostitutes, and many other humane objects which former ages would have regarded with callous and brutal indifference.

On this subject I hold entirely with Herbert Spencer, and believe with him that the chief cause of the growth of sympathy has been the decline of militarism, which has enabled most residents of English-speaking countries to go through life without being hardened by the horrors of war.

The question of the birth-rate is so simple that any child can understand it. I cannot ascertain from any of the almanacs how great the preponderance of male over female births is in the United States. But it is probably about the same as in England and Wales, where rather more than 103 male children are born to every hundred females. From these figures it is clear that on the average each hundred female children born must among them bring forth at least 203 children, to preserve the race from decline and ultimate extinction. That means that if every female infant born were to grow up and have children, the average would have to be 2.03 children per head. Even on such a Utopian assumption, the birth-rate of 2,000,000,001 proposed by Mr. James would not save the race from certain, though slow, extinction. But the idea that social reforms will abolish infant morality and premature death is quite untenable. It has no foundation in zoology. Our domestic animals are selected and reared with the utmost care; yet every one who has lived on a farm knows that there is a considerable mortality among lambs, calves and foals. It will take many generations to get our human stock into as good condition as our animal stock. If 68 per cent of our female infants lived to become mothers they would have to bear exactly three children each to keep the race even in numbers. When we have allowed for early death, ill-health, hereditary taints and inability to have children, we shall be pretty lucky when we can get sixty-eight good mothers out of every hundred females born.

Criticisms Continued.

BY C. L. JAMES.

There is much that is good in Harriet R.'s letter, but the following is a bad break, "Society needs cleansing before it would be safe to drop the present government system." Harriet should have said, society needs cleansing before it will be easy, or even possible, to drop the present governmental system. It is not ordinarily practicable to avoid walking on pavements, mailing letters, and in other ways using the present governmental system. Nor are taxes, proverbially classed with death, as inevitable, by any means easy to evade. But it is always safe to drop as much of any system as is possible at the time; and there is no other way in which society can be cleansed.

As to the comparison between public schools and home instruction, it is as certain as waater runs down hill that division of labor will more and more make what is called education the work of a class possessing peculiar aptitudes derived from practice. But what is that which is called education? It is the process of making a citizen; of reducing originality to the mill-horse routine of a social function, of polishing the brick and roughening the diamond. This is the least part of education properly understood, and ought to be the last. First make a man, then a skillful operator, and last, if at all, as much of a citizen as is desirable by the parent who wishes states to pass away. Now for the first and principal part of education, the making of an original, independent man, there is no instructor whose skill is as valuable as the parent's zeal, and no parent whose zeal produces skill but the individualist. Therefore the individualist doubly betrays his trust if he lets the schoolmaster get nearer his child's education than himself. The individualist owes his child a training in individualism. He owes himself success in such training. Let him make it the first object that the child shall think: that his own ideas shall seem to him the most worthy of consideration; that his own impulses towards mechanics, or art, or romance, or humor, or whatever bent his genius takes, should be the lode-star of his life. When he has learnt the blessedness of being himself, let him learn that society is a conspiracy to make him a pin or wheel in a machine. So he will learn to hate "society." Carry this into detail. Teach him to hate in particulars; show him how hateful is luere, government, Grundy, superstition, respectability, clothes. When he is thorough in all this you may safely say, "My son, though I have taught you to be honest with yourself, others will sometimes absolutely make you lie to them. It is better you did so judiciously than injudiciously. Go to the schoolmaster now. His trade is teaching this last part of what you need to study."

The discussion between R. B. Kerr and Kate Austin about the capacities of women, like all such debates, reminds me of John Stuart Mill's dictum, that until women have been on a footing with men in schooling and other kinds of education, for some considerable time, it must be impossible to tell whether there is any difference between their powers, and still more to tell in what the difference consists. The animal examples cited by Mr. Kerr are not very happily chosen; and the a priori physiology strikes me as inconclusive.

There is much more difference in size and, I presume, in strength, between a drone and a worker bee than between a stallion and a mare, a bull and a cow, a boar and a sow, a ram and a ewe, or a Tom and a tabby. Yet the drone is incapable of doing anything either for the feeding or defense of the hive; he depends on the workers for the honey he eats and protection against the assaults of other swarms (the bees being inveterate robbers). His only function is impregnating the queen, which costs his life. After that has been done, the bees kill off their sovereign's unsuccessful suitors as no longer of any use. How does it happen that the worker bee, smaller, and therefore having a less proportion of area to bulk than the drone, so much surpasses him in social importance? It happens because she has a sting which he has not, because she is instinctively a honey-gatherer and a fighter which he is not, because she at least has been capable of developing into a mother, while all his utility consists in this that there must be drones enough to make sure one will become a father.

Organs and corresponding instincts count for much more than undirected mechanical power; as one English cruiser was more formidable in Queen Elizabeth's time than three Spanish galleons. Superior depth and complexity of brain convolution, if it existed (I don't say it does), would certainly make the smallest human female much more than a match for Goliah in everything upon which success in life depends at the present. That men expend less force in propagation than women seems to me a very doubtful proposition. If each father and mother only came together once for each child it might be true. Throughout the animal kingdom perpetuity of each race demands that the male shall be always ready for this function, and able, at least almost every time to consummate it, while the female is not always willing and often unable to reach the ultimate though willing.

The American universities may, for reasons which Mr. Kerr has intimated, supply a better test of male and female brain capacity than the English. At the University of Wisconsin, by the catalogue of 1895-6, which I take at random, there were 1589 students. To count the males and females, whose relative numbers are not stated, is too big a job, but I counted the seniors, finding forty-seven girls and 131 boys. At this rate the boys exceed the girls almost exactly in the proportion of 2.8 to 1. The number who took degrees are as follows:

Ratio of boys to girls, 3.4 to 1.

Considering the enormous disproportion in the graduating, and no doubt the competing numbers for one kind of honors (legal), this is fully as good a showing for girls as boys. The attempt made by the author of "Sex in Education" to prove that girls suffered physically by these intellectual efforts, has by no means been held very successful. The slender data do, I think, show that female sex is not very favorable to genius properly so-called; that is to fundamental originality. After making every allowance for subjection, exclusion from professions, and training in conformity, the number of historic women who possessed this rarest among faculties must seem surprisingly small. There certainly are a few; but I should say that the Hatasu, Queens Isabella and Elizabeth, the Empresses Theodora and Catherine I., Mrs. Stowe and George Eliot, pretty near complete the list. On the other hand, if experience, since the partial emancipation of women proves anything, it proves that in talent, that in capacity to do well and with minor improvements, whatever no longer requires to be absolutely invented, women are fully equal to men; and that the maternal function is no great impediment to their extra-maternal undertakings.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXXIV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THE PROCUREMENT OF LABOR AND SKILL. As in the procurement of capital, experience must determine what inducements must be offered to attract labor and skill in the desired proportions. These inducements take two forms, the money award for labor and skill, and the relative influence in the management of affairs secured by increase in the number of votes. If more capital, more skill or more labor is needed, it will be a matter of judgment whether to increase the award or the representation. The time spent in labor in the groups would furnish a basis for the vote of labor. The relative rating in the groups would furnish a mode of apportioning the vote of skill. The individual award at the end of the year would furnish a measure of labor and skill combined which might be used as a basis instead of determining each separately. Holding shares of stock would furnish a basis for the vote of capital.

It is a piece of idle sentimentality that truth, merely as truth, has any inherent power denied to error, of prevailing against the dungeon and the stake. Men are not more zealous for truth than they often are for error, and a sufficient application of legal or even of social penalties will generally succeed in stopping the propagation of either. The real advantage which truth has consists in this, that when an opinion is true, it may be extinguished once, twice, or many times, but in the course of ages there will generally be found persons to rediscover it, until some one of its reappearances falls on a time when from favorable circumstances it escapes persecution until it has made such head as to withstand all subsequent attempts to suppress it.—Mill, "On Liberty."

Do what thy manhood bids thee do, from none but self expect applause.
He noblest lives and noblest dies who makes and keeps his self-made laws.
All other life is living death, a world where none but phantoms dwell,
A breath, a wind, a sound, a voice, a tinkling of the camel-bell.

In the Piney Woods.

Leaving St. Louis via Illinois Central, Feb. 2, I had a somewhat tiresome night ride in the chair-car through Southern Illinois, Western Kentucky and Western Tennessee. The weather was quite cold—considerable snow on the ground on leaving Missouri, but when daylight came there was no snow to be seen and as the day wore on the temperature became decidedly spring-like. As the train pulled through Memphis, Tenn., we were enveloped in a dense fog—characteristic of the Mississippi river in winter—so dense that the view of the city was wholly obscured. Passing out again from the direct influence of "The Father of Waters"—so called by the American Indians—the fog lifted, and for the rest of the way to Jackson, the capital city of the state named for the great river, the weather was showery, with frequent flashes of lightning and loud claps of thunder—a typical April day. Soon the long festoons of hanging moss, the magnolias, the live oaks, etc., etc., make the traveler aware of the fact that he is nearing the Gulf of Mexico. Windows and doors of the houses are wide open as in summer, making it hard to realize that only a few hours have passed since our train left a city in which every one seemed chiefly concerned in keeping the frost and snow out of dwellings and places of business.

At Cold Springs, Miss., a station without a station-house of any kind, I was met by William P. Fogg, late of Palos, Ill., with horse and vehicle to convey the tired pilgrim to the home his mother and himself have been for some months making among the pines, near Thayer, Miss. The spot of earth chosen by mother and son for their future residence is one combining many advantages. The lay of the land is high and rolling, the hills covered with yellow pine timber, reminding one of the hills of Southeastern Missouri, the chief difference being that the Mississippi hills are not stony—as were those among which the writer of these lines grew from boyhood to manhood.

Among the advantages of this section are: pure air, pure and abundant water, adaptability to fruit-raising, mild climate and nearness to direct railway communication with Chicago, St. Louis and other great northern cities. If it were not for the curse of land monopoly it is quite probable that this pine belt would soon be thickly settled by home-seekers from the northern and eastern states of the American union.

[The above was sent us by the editor, and we expected to have the remainder in time for this issue, but it has failed to arrive. In private letters he reports that his health is improving—at least so far as his cold is concerned.]

C. C. Moore Convicted.

On Monday, Feb. 7, C. C. Moore and J. B. Hughes editor and publisher of the "Blue Grass Blade," appeared before the United States District Court in Cincinnati to be tried on a charge of sending obscene literature through the mails. Judge Feland, of Kentucky, represented Mr. Hughes, but Mr. Moore had engaged no attorney and refused to accept the services of Judge Feland or of an attorney provided by the court.

Judge Feland obtained a separate trial for his client. Mr Moore's case was called first. He shouldered the responsibility for the publication, and made what the reporters call a "long, rambling talk." He said that he did not advocate free love, and could prove the truth of his statement by "prominent free love papers in Chicago." He went back to the war, and told of the position he had taken then; told the jury he was a prohibitionist and an infidel and an advocate of morality.

It is probable that a full report of his speech will be published in the "Blue Grass Blade" of Feb. 13. We have only reports of the daily papers, which are probably very inaccurate. The jury took ten minutes to find that the defendant was "guilty as charged."

The case of James E. Hughes was then called. Judge Feland merely attempted to prove by his client and Mr. Moore that Hughes was not responsible for the publication, and submitted the case to the jury without argument. In fifteen minutes the jury returned a verdict of "guilty."

The prisoners were then released on their own recognizances to return for sentence the next day. The following morning Mr. Hughes was sentenced to pay a fine of $25 and costs, (which amounted to about $80 altogether,) and Mr. Moore was sentenced to two years in the penitentiary.

This is merely another case showing that to be arrested on the charge of sending obscene literature through the mails is practically the same as to be convicted. It is unfortunate that the case was not more strongly defended; but conviction would probably have followed anyway.

The newspapers say that Mr. Moore was charged with advocating free love; but as a matter of fact, this is not true. The technical charge was simply the usual accusation regarding the depositing in the mail of lewd and obscene matter. I do not believe Mr. Moore understands what free love is, nor that he either would or could seriously defend it. One of the paragraphs on which the indictment is based consisted of the statement that it might possibly be better for the health of men and women if they should associate as freely sexually as they associate in any other way. At any rate, this is my recollection of the matter. I may be mistaken. But if my memory is not at fault, it it as absurd to call him an advocate of free love as it would be to so designate the doctor who advises a young man to have sexual association with prostitutes for the good of his health, regardless of the absence of any feeling of love.

But whether C. C. Moore advocated or condemned free love, whether he called white black or black white, has nothing to do with the case. He has a right to publish his opinions on these or on any other subjects, and neither the postoffice inspector nor the judge nor the jury nor any other person is compelled to read his paper.

If the "Blue Grass Blade" is published during the incarceration of its editor, I hope that every lover of freedom will subscribe for it. The price is $1 a year, and its address, Lexington, Ky.

L. H.

Moore's conviction is an outrage of the principle of freedom of speech and of the press, although he himself seemingly invited suppression by publishing in his paper as the first demand of the "Blue Grass Blade":

"Such a suppression, peaceably if possible, by force, if necessary, of the Christian religion of the United States," etc.

His antagonism to the Christian religion will be pardoned by every person who believes in liberty of thought, but demand for "suppression," "by force if necessary," puts him outside the theology is a prerogative of the church, and Charles C. Moore forgets his right to respect as an infidel when he adopts theological tactics.

But, although he has invited his own conviction, it does not make that conviction just. His writings may be called silly, phemous, but certainly a man who could find anything obscene in the "Blue Grass Blade" could find obscenity in a grammar school book on botany or a catalogue of cattle, horse or dog shows.

As a matter of fact, Moore's conviction is due to the personal enemies he has made by his peculiar and virulent style of journalism. There is not the shadow of proof of crime against him, unless his crime is his annoyance of certain persons who imagine that his imprisonment may check the advance of free thought in America.

FREEDOM IN LOVE.

This is based upon the fact, fundamental and necessitous, of the "sovereignty of the individual" in the social sphere, as well as in the political and the ethical sphere. Freedom and development are correlative. Aspiration and experimentation lead to perfection. No enlightened mind will use fraud or force to compass its ends, nor willingly countenance such a course in others. Perfect complementation is the ideal of sex love, but the consummation of that ideal will be modified by opportunity.

DEFINITIONS.

Variety has little if anything in common with promiscuity. Promiscuity is one gross passion with a multiplicity of vehicles; whereas variety involves the factor of appreciation, or physical and mental discrimination with regard to co opposite sex; and it may or may not be the means of realizing a conscious ideal. Promiscuity is characteristic of primitiveness and cruelty and has no more connection with free love per se, than with bond love. If we make perfect complementation our criterion (as we must) then, critically speaking, either variety or union for life may be the means to that end; but both are irrelevant in any other sense. The standard is universal, the application personal. Prostitution is the ignoble use of any function whether intellectual or affectional.

CONJUGATION.

Two may associate for physical development, and thus contract a physical union; two may associate for mental development, and thus contract a mental union; or they may associate for physical and mental development, and thus contract a physico-mental, or full union. The full union may lapse into the semi-union; the semi-union may lapse, or may progress to the full union.

DURATION.

A union of any kind should have its incentive and origin in spontaneous desire, and should continue with the continuance of mutual attraction and good results. Our ideal attracts us most strongly, and we desire it most; therefore, a union is good so long as it aligns itself with that ideal, but no longer. As long as it conforms with this requirement it is virtuous; when it ceases to do so it is vicious.

The length of a union should not be raised into a canon of morality, but considered as a resultant pre-determined by the factors involved in its inception; as a variant consequent dependent upon antecedent conditions not always fully comprehended.

MATRIMONY AND MATRIMANY.

Abstractly considered, is marriage as an institution practicable and desirable? Are incidental loves permissible? Can the wife or husband ever be, normally, more than the refrain of the epithalamium—the burden of the conjugial song? Certain it is, that if free marriage be authorized, it is logically requisite that free divorce should likewise be authorized. If it be permitted to choose, it follows that the rectification of the choice should be granted. And to put it still stronger, if it be allowable for one partner to decline conjugation with the other, it is justifiable for this same partner to seek conjugation elsewhere; for negative and positive liberty must ever balance each other—one cannot logically be conceded without conceding the other. Hence, orthodox marriage must ever imply "marital duties," potential or actual.

This is not to say, however, that a free lover would choose to put this positive liberty into operation; it might be deemed expedient not to do so, especially if he or she were seeking to perpetuate a particular union. Then, too, there is another way of looking at positive and negative liberty; sometimes we get as much happines in self-denial by indirection as in direct self-gratification; sometimes we get as much ultimate good by adapting ourselves to the wishes of another as in conforming that other to our own wishes.

It seems impracticable to formulate a specific answer to this question, such an answer as would cover the case of this or that individual; only the general principle can be set forth, and each individual must make his or her own application of it; for only he or she is in possession of the full premise, and no one, without this, is capable of drawing the correct conclusion. To advocate more than freedom of thought and action then, is to substitute preference for principle; to advocate less is to dwarf the possibilities of humankind. To the rational mind that has divested itself of superstition, and attained the conception of freedom and purity the question of sex consummatfon is merely one of expediency; but the expedient will be indicative of the sagacity of the mind that employs it.

It seems to the writer that, under favorable conditions, permanent bona fide unions will be formed, and endure by spontaneous attraction; and it does not logically follow, I think, that such associations would necessarily terminate because of incidental or transient loves. Such unions, under favorable auspices, are in line with the economics of nature, and well adapted under the existing regime, to the requirements of parental love and family life.

It may be wise, therefore, even for the radical, to seek ideal complementation through matrimony; though whether he can conscientiously approve of orthodox marriage, any more than he can of prostitution, is another question. Matrimony means one womb, and such unions would necessarily be exclusive only in the sense of this degree of conjugation. Within this limit, the consensus of faculties could choose to restrict the manifestation of ultimate physical love. It is debatable, of course, as to how far exclusiveness can be carried—to what extent a normal sex-love can concentrate itself upon one other person, and by what methods of expression.

The philosophy of the permanent union is simply this, that sooner or later a certain positive and negative are likely to come together who will so nearly realize perfect complementation, and between whom there will spring up such a spontaneous and strong attachment as to preclude dissolution by any other attachment of a similar kind; hence, permanency will result, and be cemented by a common experience. The infelicities of the present marriage relation are in all probability due more to an ill-considered selection in the first place, to the prevalence of unwise habits of life, and to a false economical system, than to any inherent defect arising from its mere continuance during life. Legal marriage has this to its credit, at least, that it fixes responsibility as to parentage and disposes of the question of property inheritance in a practical way; it forefends accidental births, and tends to limit venereal contagion.

OFFSPRING.

Children should not be called into existence unless the parents can impart a good endowment of mind and body, and have a fair prospect of securing to such offspring suitable care during the period of immaturity.

THE DATA OF ETHICS, by Herbert Spencer, is a book needed in every library. Here is an opportunity to obtain a handsome copy of this masterpiece, practically free. We have obtained a small supply handsomely bound in maroon cloth, with gold lettering and gilt tops, printed in large, clear type on good heavy paper. It contains 350 pages, and is divided into sixteen chapters. Until the present supply is exhausted we will send a copy of this book to anyone who sends us the address of a NEW subscriber, accompanied by one dollar for Lucifer one year, and ten cents for postage on the book. This is an offer which you cannot afford to miss, and which we cannot afford to duplicate after these books are gone.

To Florence.

W. F. BARNARD.

Florence, who looks in your eyes,
Sees true woman's feeling rise
Through all their liquid depths up from the heart, where aye it lies.

Florence, who may see you smile,
Sees your spirit free from guile,
Its every portal open to the world full wide the while.

Florence, who looks on your brow
Feels that wisdom will endow
The brain within; that you will noble be, somewhere, somehow.

Florence, who may see your face,
In all its features clear will trace
The evidence of ample worth worn with wholesome grace.

Florence, who may know your thought
Knows that freedom is enwrought
With all your aims, with all you seek, with all which you have sought.

Florence, one looks on you long;
Even I; and fervid praises throng
Within his breast, and on his lips the speech of love grows strong.
Paris, France.

May I reach
That purest Heaven—be to other souls
The cup of strength in some great agony,
Enkindle generous ardor, feed pure love,
Beget the smiles that have no cruelty,
Be the sweet presence of a good diffused,
And in diffusion ever more intense!
Shall I join the choir invisible
Whose music is the gladness of the world.

— George Eliot.

"I am sure it is a mistake to be forever looking back to the past for precedents," she said. "The past has it charm, of course, but it is the charm of the charnel-house—it is the dead past, and what was good for one age is bad for another."

"As one man's meat is another man's poison?" he said.

"Proverbs prove nothing," she answered lightly. "Have you noticed that they go in pairs? There is always one for each side of an argument. 'One man's meat is another man's poison,' is met by 'What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander'—and so on. But don't you think it absurd to cling to old customs that are dying a natural death? Learn of the past, if you like, but live in the present, and make your laws to meet its needs. It is this eternal waiting on the past to copy it rather than to be warned by its failures, to do as it did, under the impression, apparently, that we must succeed better than it did, following in its footsteps, though we know they led to ruin once, and, because the way was pleasant, being surprised to find that it must end again in disaster—it is this abandonment of all hope of finding new and efficacious remedies for the old diseases of society that has checked our progress by hundreds of years, and will keep the world in some respects just as it was at the time of the Crucifixion. For my own part, I cannot see that history does repeat itself, except in trifling details, and in the lives of unimportant individuals."—"Ideala."

It is supposed to be an axiom of law that a man is innocent until proven guilty, but modern jurisprudence is doing much to convince us that he is guilty until proven innocent. The mind of the people is already contaminated to a degree that is appalling. Here for instance, is a book of New York views, issued by the "Bond Record." Under one picture is this legend: "The Tombs—The Place of Detention for Criminals Awaiting Trial." What is the object of trial at law? To determine whether the accused is or is not a criminal. How, then, in the name of justice and the English language, can a man "awaiting trial" be called a criminal? There are at this hour in the Tombs a large number of men who will be declared innocent when their causes are tried. Therefore, they are not criminals; they would not be "awaiting trial" if they were, and it is a foul outrage for the "Bond Record" to assert that the Tombs is a "place of detention for criminals awaiting trial." But our police and many of our courts proceed upon the assumption that accusation is equivalent to conviction.—E. C. W.

In Behalf of a Veteran Worker.

Lois Waisbrooker, the veteran worker in the cause of social reform will reach the seventy-third mile post in the journey of life the 21st of this month (February). This should be accepted as a favorable time for her friends and the friends of the unpopular cause she has so long and fearlessly represented, to give to her a practical recognition of their appreciation of the great work she has so ably championed for nearly two generations.

This can be done by sending one dollar to her address, 28 8th St., San Francisco, Cal. In return she will send one of her books on social reform. Her work is strictly in line with the needs of the age, and although radical in sentiment, it enlightens men and women on the true demands of their natures, and the road to a higher civilization and a nobler man and womanhood attained through the agency of our improved generation and a more natural and perfect education. As the champion of an unpopular cause, the material aid attending this recognition would no doubt be most acceptable, and at the same time a tribute she has justly earned. S. J. GILL.

When I hear a man complaining that some cause which he has at heart will be put back for years by a speech or a book I suspect that his attachment to it is a prejudice, that he has no consciousness of standing on a rock.—William Ellery Channing.

Spots of dirt thrown upon my character I suffered, while fresh, to remain. I did not choose to spread by endeavoring to remove them, but relied upon the vulgar adage that they would all rub off when dry.—B. Franklin.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Jennie Wade, Bradford, Ohio.—I hope the editor will return much benefitted by his trip. In reading the history of your father's life in Lucifer, it appealed to my sympathy, and I admire, oh how I admire, a brave, good man like him. Wish we had a few more as brave and true, to lift woman out of darkness, and upon a higher plane, for to render woman this service is to exalt and elevate the race.

E. V. Grainger, Palestine, Tex.—Enclosed find twenty-five cents for thirteen weeks' subscription to Lucifer and the following books: "Human Rights," "Love and the Law," "Sexual Enslavement of Women," "The Coming Woman." Please advise me as to whether you have published "Hilda's Home" in book form and at what price. If not, what the copies of Lucifer will cost containing the story, and if you can do so, send me the first thirteen instead of recent copies of Lucifer for the twenty-five cent trial subscription and notify me what the others will cost containing the balance of the story. Also advise me as to how far back you can furnish copies of "The Adult," and if the back numbers are supplied at yearly rates.

[See advertising page for price and description of "Hilda's Home." We can supply back numbers of '97 and '98 in complete volumes. Price unbound, $1; bound in cloth, $1.25.]

Miss L. A. Mint, Boulder, Mont.—I was very glad to see the sketch of your father in Lucifer, January 21, and inclose ten cents for copies of said number to send to friends. This article makes me more deeply interested in the work your father has devoted so much of his life to—not that I am a free lover—I have given that question no consideration; but because I love liberty in its broadest, greatest sense and realize more and more the great need of such men as your father. To him every woman owes a debt she can never pay, and I shall henceforth, as long as your father lives, do all I can to aid his paper. My own undertaking is so much greater than my strength that it requires for its development more than I can give, but there are ways in which I can help Lucifer as your father's work, and not hinder mine; how much I can do thus time alone can tell. "Yours for all good to all mankind."

Though I don't quite agree with you that "strikes usually fail," I most heartily agree with you that this is the hardest problem (the rights of labor) now demanding solution, and I inclose twenty-five cents for more copies of Lucifer, Feb. 4.

J. D. Coverstone, Bremen, Ind.—I am not now, nor ever was a subscriber to Lucifer. Some time ago I sent you a quarter for "Hell and the Way Out," and a sample copy of Lucifer, and the latter had been coming occasionally ever since. I am careful not to allow my family to read them, and always consign them to the stove after a glance at their contents, if not before. The paper has only one sensible thing in it and that is the "Referendum." But all reforms that such a sheet advocates will be impeded rather than accelerated. If you will show me any reforms that were accomplished by infidels I will have more faith in Lucifer. I know unbelievers often talk reform, but their own life belies their tongue. I judge Lucifer is no exception to the rule. A man who sets aside God's most holy laws, and tries to make better ones for himself, is like a grasshopper trying to swim the ocean; he is sure to be drowned. If God would die and leave the universe to you, you might stand some show, but as long as God lives you will have a very influential opponent. Let me adjure you to "Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness," and then advocate the Initiative and Referendum both in church governments and the state, and you will set an example of life worthy of imitation. No, I never was a subscriber to Lucifer. Yours in Christ.

Sada Bailey Fowler, Torresdale, Pa.—A good woman, Mrs. Nat, was dying ("Don't tell it for the world," the physician said, "but it is a fact Mrs. Nat is dying of too much Mr. Nat.") According to popular standards, this doctor was in duty bound to lay this precious life as a sacrifice on the altar of respectability. But a Mosiene came to rescue her sister woman from this worse than Egyptian bondage; she aided her to the divine right of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—to the consolation and company of her true mate.

Then the scandal came. The religious society in which she held an office, put the question of her expulsion to ballot. There was a tie. The president, Mr. Campbell (whose secret life could not bear examination), gave the casting vote against her. When the meeting adjourned the Mosiene took the persecuted sister's arm, saying in a loud, calm voice, "Come away from these people who have choked at a dear little gnat and swallowed a big ugly camel."

I am reminded of this in thinking how people will read the obscenity of the daily popular press and then taboo Lucifer and such books as "Irene," whose pages teem with the truth about love. Previous to my publication of "Irene" I could earn a living upon the Spiritualist rostrum, which welcomed me anywhere between the two oceans; but the Spiritualists, though many my dear personal friends, do not think the book respectable. One reason given by a popular president was, "'Tis fifty years beyond its time." One decade of that half century has already past, and I am bound to live the remaining four decades to see my persecuted child, "Irene," respectable. I have learned the grand science of retaining youth and health, love and happiness, and am unfolding these truths in my new book, with a solution of social and industrial problems. The editors of our brave Light Bearer have joined their efforts to mine in the sale of "Irene," to aid us in obtaining the means to forward this work. We have proven that a story will sell much faster at fifty cents than at twice that amount, so those who want a handsome dollar book at half price, please take notice, now is the time!

Loveth thou the truth? Then read this book, of which a critic said, "There's too much truth in it for a novel." But it was written for realistic life, yea, for honest, pure, loving life, for nobility and freedom, which does not choke at gnats and swallow camels.

Albina L. Washburn, 1728 Glenarm St., Denver, Col.—"O. M. M." in No. 738, asks me to explain definitely what I meant by "outward expressions of sexual impurity." As the expression was quoted, and I am away from my files of Lucifer, I will give what it seems to me to imply. Actions are expressions of mental impulses or conclusions. If a man is sexually impure in his mind a mentally pure woman feels it unpleasantly at once. He is gallant (if cultivated) but not just. He looks at her body, but appreciates not her noble ideas, as he cannot understand their true import. He adores beauty of form and color, well dressed. He considers woman man's game. He reveals the vulgarity of his thoughts in fulsome praise or cloudy jokes. Usually, but not always, he uses tobacco, often intoxicants. The sexually impure man is inconsiderate of others, especially his wife, who is his sexual slave. If she is not submissive he is her open or secret enemy. He is self-indulgent and in general, not too industrious. Many women who openly tolerate him express to each other a distaste for his presence.

The women who value this man are sexually impure themselves. They spend much time in self-adornment; they are also inconsiderate of others, especially of a husband who is not quite so devoted to the world's follies as they. They are looking for wealth, and evidences of wealth and pleasure; they read cheap novels; they love nothing with a deep self-sacrificing love, but with the the ferocity of the tiger—as transiently, as unreasonably and as selfishly, except the love which they give their young, whom they spoil with neglect and indulgence. To me sexual impurity implies sexual prostitution. The sex powers are perverted to transient, what we call lower pleasures.

It is a pleasure to a hungry boy to eat a green apple, yet nature rebels and he suffers, or if he feels no ill effects then the habit of ignorant self-indulgence will bring sorrow in after life. Ignorance of the better way leads to the waste of vital force in lower forms of self-indulgence. Secrecy, deceit and dishonesty usually accompany this self indulgence, not so much because of the watchfulness of society as because of the still small voice heard at intervals of self-dissatisfaction, saying, "Come up higher."

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the lancet deep into the ulcerous sores of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1 50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN

IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.
The "Care of Children" is something every mother ought to read.
It teaches the value of Air, Sunshine, and Water as medicines.
It contains valuable information for the married.

This book cannot fail to please you. If you are looking for health by the safest and easiest means, do not delay getting it. It has eight hundred pages, is neatly bound in cloth with gold letters, and will be sent by mail or express prepaid to any address for $2.75. Address M. Harman, 1304 Congress St., Chicago, Ill.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 288 pages. Price, 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Don't Forget You've Married Me!

Now, Marco dear,
My wishes hear,
While you're away
It's understood
You will be good,
And not too gay.
To every trace
Of maiden grace
You will be blind,
And will not glance
By any chance
On womankind!
If you are wise,
You'll shut your eyes
'Till we arrive,
And not address
A lady less
Than forty-five:
You'll please to frown
On every gown
That you may see:
And O, my pet,
You won't forget
You've married me!

You'll lay your head
Upon your bed
At set of sun.
You will not sing
Of anything
To any one:
You'll sit and mope
All day I hope,
And shed a tear
Upon the life
Your little wife
Is passing here!
And if so be
You think of me,
Please tell the moon:
I'll read it all
In rays that fall
On the lagoon:
You'll be so kind
As tell the wind
How you may be,
And send me words
By little birds
To comfort me!

And O, my darling, O, my pet,
Whatever else you may forget,
In yonder isle beyond the sea,
O, don't forget you've married me!

Fragments.

BY ROSEA M'COY.

Is it any wonder that a nation which tolerates Comstock should repudiate the doctrine that governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed?

The cry of the Imperialists is that the Filipinos are incapable of self-government. So England said of the American colonists in 1776. So the governors always say of the governed.

Lillian, Lillian Bell, how could you go and tell
Such naughty things about the good St. Anthony? You know you should Not cause his pious friends to start by advocating undraped art.
Such shocking things you tell, Lillian Bell.

The attitude of Comstock to other Americans is practically the same as the attitude of American imperialists toward the Filipinos. He contends that other Americans are incapable of governing themselves (being moral) without his assistance.

Marriage is illegal in Missouri and some other states. Not only bigamous marriage and the marriage of persons under statutory age, but even the voluntary marriage of a mature man and woman, neither of whom has a matrimonial mate Sounds incredible, doesn't it? Nevertheless in Missouri the law prescribes a penalty of $500 fine and a year in jail for the officia who issues a license for white and black persons to marry.

"Give your authors liberty, but not license," says Lillian Bell. "Permit them to write and allow even the American girl to read, and believe me, you will find that America is not the hotbed for divorce which it is at present." She might have added with as much, if not more truth: "Give your daughters liberty, but not license, and there will be few divorces." In most of the states of the union a license necessarily precedes a divorce.

Walter Hurt, editor of the "Gatling Gun," Cleveland, Ohio, has been arrested on the charge of publishing obscene articles in his paper. The principle of liberty is too precious to be sacrificed even in the cases of such men as Hurt and Charles C. Moore, both of whom through their papers have advocated the regulation of other people's affairs. It is the irony of fate that both these ardent champions of morality, should be arrested on charges of immorality. But that does not mitigate the outrage of their arrest.

Ring the alarum bell! Call up Anthony the Abominable and Parkhurst the Pharisee. What mean such goings on as this related in a telegram to the "Chicago Tribune" of Feb. 16?

"Cupid appeared in the flesh at a St. Valentine's dinner given by Mrs. Emma Eames Story in the Hotel Marie Antoinette, New York, to a few of her friends. It was a live pickaninny undraped that the DeReszkes and other guests beheld when the crowning feature of the dinner was reached. To say that the little chap created a sensation is putting it mildly."

R. B. Kerr asks why women have not equalled men as writers of poetry and hymns. From a Christian point of view can be name any hymns written by men which can surpass in sentiment and diction "Nearer My God to Thee," "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken" and "Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory of the Coming of the Lord", all written by women? Can he cite anything from Shakespeare or any other male dramatist surpassing the noble and sublime sentiment of love of libert expressed in "Rienza's Address to the Romans," by Miss Mitford?

Lillian Bell astounded the prim members of the Chicago Baptist Union in an address before that body a few days ago, by declaring Anthony Comstock and the American girl are throttling art in America. This is an outrageous slander on the average American girl, who is far removed from prudery in spite of her pernicious education. The girls who are the allies of Anthony the Abominable are, for the most part, elderly maidens of soured temper, and married women, who by false education and clerical domination have been led to believe their Heavenly Father made a grievous mistake in allowing people to be born naked.

Annie Peterson arrived in New York on the Anchoria from Denmark, Feb. 14, with Mormon Elder Brand, with whom she was going to Brinton, Utah. She said she believed in polygamy because it was in the Bible. Deputy Commissioner of Immigration

McSweeney decided that he could not exclude a person who merely believed in polygamy, and she was allowed to proceed. But Amalia Witkow was sent back to England the next day after her arrival in New York about a year ago because she said she did not believe in marriage. Amalia should have quoted the Bible, too, saying, "In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage" and "I am the resurrection and the life."

Comstockism Condemned

"Chicago Chronicle," Feb. 15.

Lillian Bell, in responding to the toast "Hopeful Aspects of Literary Life in Chicago," said some plain things to the members of the Chicago Baptist Social Union assembled at a banquet in the Auditorium last night, which made them look at each other and gasp with the cold drenching of radicalism which she gave them.

She told them that the puritan element in American life was the great obstacle in the way of the development of the great American novel so long awaited. She said that the trouble lay with "the country which makes Anthony Comstock and the American girl the standard of taste. It is the puritan element in America today which is crippling art.

"When Boston rejects one of the masterpieces of genius because it is nude; when a magazine which never permits an artist to picture in its pages a woman in a decollette gown circulates 750,000 copies a month; when Anthony Comstock can pronounce against a picture and carry enough public opinion to force its removal from the art gallery; when the people of a great, educated country like ours say we will have nothing on our shelves that our daughters cannot look at or read in the presence of young men; then I say it is time to lock up your daughters and jail your young men and drive your authors to Europe.

"It is a crime against taste and humanity and genius to allow an author to begin a novel full of strong human passion, dealing with the great problems of life and death and the tragedy of love, and then at a vital point, because of provincial public opinion, to force him to stop short of the truth and make him don his mincing patent leathers and limp lamely to a false conclusion. You force him to shuffle and equivocate. Your daughters learn these half truths by heart.

"American novels are too expunged to be true to life. They are novels of clever details of witty conversations and delicate truths which gives your brain little tingles of delight when you read them. But the great things of life, the problems of existence which are tearing like wolves at your heart and mine, are never grasped and handled firmly. They are staggered around and hinted at, and the author stutters and coughs behind his hand until his readers are blushing for what he so palpably avoided.

"American modesty, when all is done and said, is largely American overdone self-consciousness. But your poor author, even if he dares to write what his soul tells him, what his art demands, the publishers, who know their American public, send back his novel to be expunged.

"Not many of you here tonight know the number of fine novels thus cut and mutilated by publishers, because you would not buy them unless they were filtered until they became anæmic. Ignorance is not innocence. Keep your girls in ignorance if you like, but do not imagine that they owe you thanks for it or that you will get it when once they know the truth."....

When Miss Bell finished reading her paper a decidedly frosty atmosphere pervaded the banquet hall. She was feebly applauded and she left the room with a pugnacious toss of her head. "I meant every word of it," she said with an air of defiance.

The function closed with the singing of the doxology.

The evils of our fate are doubled by dwelling on them; a scratch becomes a wound, a jest an insult, and a slight sickness often ends in death by brooding apprehensions.—Selected.

Arraignment of Marriage.

BY B. F. ODELL.

Any person who thoroughly and candidly investigates the bearings of marriage, of marriage slavery, of the subjection of one woman to all the sexual demands of one man, however beastly he may be, for that is just what marriage requires, can come to but one conclusion. That must be that marriage causes more misery, directly and indirectly, than any other one institution.

After all that is done to smother, keep down and hide all the horrors, the heartaches, the blasted hopes and ruined lives of so many women in the homes of our land, the smothered wail still reaches every ear. Every influence that can possibly be brought to bear upon those who suffer the evils of marriage, is used to suppress any exposure, especially of sexual oppression. Social ostracism, almost as bad as that dealt to the prostitute, is the ever ready scourge to prevent suffering wives from revealing the skeleton in the closet. Could the countless lips be unsealed, a tale would be told that would exceed in horror anything the world has ever heard.

It is not the unceasing round of household duties that makes married life so hard for women. It is not so much the burden and wear of bearing and rearing undesired children, with its wearying anxieties, cares and labors, though that is enough to make life an unending drag; it is the nervous strain, exhausting vitality—and all the long list of female complaints that follow undesired sex association—that is taking health, hope and happiness from the women of our land.

But it is not the women alone that are reaping the bitter fruit of our marriage system. A race of physically enfeebled children are generated. Worse still, their minds are distorted and soured by prenatal conditions. Race progress, except in mere intellectuality, has ceased. Physically and morally the race is at a standstill.

Moreover, public illegal prostitution owes its origin and huge proportions to the exclusiveness of the marriage system. Its deep depravity and its horrors too are due to the relentless treading down of any woman who refuses to sell herself as a perpetual sexual slave to some one man, to forever be at the beck and call of his sexual appetites, regardless of her own natural feelings.

This is done to uphold marriage slavery, and for no other purpose. Sensual men do not want women to have any opportunity to gratify their natural normal sex instincts in any other manner than as a sex slave to some man. It is so much more convenient for the merely animal instincts of the man to always have a woman ready for his use that he cannot afford to have his pet institution endangered and have to run the risk of finding a willing partner. Of course unwilling or forced association is below the animal. Willing association is only on the animal plane, while love association alone ennobles and elevates.

The marriage adherent will ignore all this and uphold the forced association which even animals are not guilty of. Just think, all this hounding down to destruction of the woman who will not, or does not become a sexual slave to some man is to uphold the most infernal and degrading slavery the world ever knew—the slavery of woman's most sacred nature.

But countless thousands, yes millions, under forms of respectable marriage are just as much sold to gratify some one man's sexual desires as is the prostitute. Continued support, a home, a name, respectability may be the price, sex association, often repugnant, the result. Is it any less prostitution because for life so that she cannot avoid being debauched if she would? Is she any more pure that she binds herself hand and foot for life? No, no! Purity is not made by law nor ceremony. No ceremony can change the pure into impurity or impure into purity. Nature fixes the status. Laws and customs cannot change it.

Each one of the countless thousands who sell themselves into marriage is worse off than her illegal counterpart would be were she not beaten down by society. Were the illegal one received in society and given a fair chance to engage in other occupations so as not to depend exclusively on the proceeds of her prostitution for a livelihood, her condition would be much better than that of the average married woman. It is the forced association that gives to prostitution its horrors, not that the associations are outside of marriage. Give the illegal prostitute a fair chance, and in every line she will stand above the legal married prostitute. Her business and labor would enable her to refuse undesired sex associations, while the married woman would gain no relief from her husband however much she earned in business or by her labor.

The illegal prostitute would not be burdened with undesired children like her married sister. She could measurably choose her occupation and not be bound to the ceaseless round of domestic toil and worry that confronts her married sister.

Under freedom both these forms of prostitution would cease to exist. When women are free, will they want to sell themselves into undesired, repulsive sex associations? They do so now, both in and out of marriage. To ask the question is to answer it. We know that undesired association must be forced by some means. The woman that is really free will never permit it. Some hold, some bondage must compel her to submit to it. Of all the means that are or can be used to force her consent there is none so common, or so respectable as marriage to force woman to violate her own sex nature, to become a prostitute, to one man it may be, but a prostitute still.

Now, prostitution is the bane of the race. It is eating away the physical and moral stamina of mankind. It should be the work of our lives to fight it. To do this effectively we must strike at the very center of all prostitution—the marriage system.

The martyr spirit is required in this contest. The selfish sensuality of man under a thousand false pretexts will strike down all who strive to free his slave, and endanger his easy gratification. The road to freedom will pass over the bodies of thousands of martyrs.

The Equality of the Sexes.

BY KATE AUSTIN.

I protest against R. B. Kerr's insinuation that in a former article I asserted the immense superiority of women. What I did say most emphatically was this: "That woman is fitted by nature to compete on an equality with man in all the activities of life." If that be treason to man "make the most of it." I have admitted the "natural distinction of the sexes in physical efficiency." That, as friend Kerr stated, "can be proved by a glance at the lower animals." But when he goes on to state that intellectual differences undoubtedly exist, but cannot be proved by "observing the lower animals," it plainly shows that the masculine claim to mental superiority has not a "leg to stand on." For we cannot dispute the fact that among the lower animals the female gives positive evidence that her mental faculties are as well developed as those of the male. And to use the exact words of Mr. Kerr, "They have no artificial institutions, favoring the male, therefore we are prepared to accept them as conclusive evidence on the subject of the natural relation of the sexes."

It really looks as if Mr. Kerr is "hoist by his own petard." If the human female is inferior to the male in intellect, it would be interesting to know when and how she lost the birthright of mental equality bestowed upon the lower forms of animal life. Is it possible in her case, a cog slipped in the chain of evolution that was to elevate the race above the beasts of the field, and so she hangs suspended a little lower than man?

Quite a number of animals besides the man-like apes cooperate to rear their young. This is noticeably true with birds. The pride and affection and watchful care bestowed by the gander upon the little downy goslings is a sight to behold.

Why do they sing of maternal love and ignore the paternal love that exists here and there among the lower animals, reaching its highest excellence in man? If nature designed the male the special protector of the female the design ought to be more apparent.

All I can see is this, that among the higher forms of life, including man, is a deep, strong undercurrent of sympathy that impels the members of a group to rush to the aid of those in extremity. There are periods in the lives of all when they must depend upon the love and care of others or perish. This sympathy finds its highest expression in the human race, though greatly perverted by our social institutions, and instinctively compels all to bestow their services where most needed, irrespective of the sex of the sufferer. The wild herds rush madly to the aid of one in distress, be it calf, cow or bull. Darwin tells of the stormful wrath, the agonized entreaty that drove a company of baboons from their safe retreat among the rocks to secure the body of their dead comrade shot by the hunters. The man-like apes, who assist the mother in preparing for the advent of their offspring, exhibit this sympathy and the instincts of the true father. Unlike apes, man makes no preparation for the coming of the being he has created unless he has a legal claim to the mother; which proves "our institutions to be unfavorable" to the man, in failing to develop those admirable qualities possessed by his primitive ancestor, the ape.

Mr. Kerr appears very sensitive to remarks reflecting on man. Doubtless he thinks my sex has grown callous in this respect. The average man having a better opportunity to develop his thinking powers than the average woman, it naturally follows that the best hymns are the result of his headwork. A well-developed brain gives the ability to do the very best, even in such insignificant things as writing hymns.

Mr. Kerr protests that I "unjustly accuse him of trying to prove that woman is man's inferior." If the whole trend of his controversy is not an endeavor to prove woman's mental inferiority then I do not understand English. The last argument he brings is this: That women do not possess the energy of men to work their brains and muscles because of their inferior size.

How do the men of the past and present who distinguished themselves in art, science, literature, politics and war, compare in size with their fellows—Lord Byron and Gibbon for instance? Would not Napoleon Bonaparte "lose more heat by radiation from having more exposed surface in proportion to his total mass" than John L. Sullivan? If the "law of the conservation of energy" does not prove fatal in the case of men like Bonaparte, Byron or Gibbon and thousands of others physically inferior to their fellows, who found their fitness to compete on an equality in the struggle for existence, I do not see how it can very well apply to woman. As to where women get their energy I can only reply in the name of Madam Roland, Charlotte Corday, George Eliot and Harriet Martineau; it is their priceless possession.

"Meddler" calls attention to the act of John August Brown, one of Minneapolis' men of means and culture. Early last spring when the violets were budding into bloom, the wife of Brown, Sophia, and Stephen Heegle fell in love with one another and were found out. What did Brown do? Get a gun and start on an expedition of extermination? No, dear reader, he had another plan to get even. He told Sophia to get a divorce and marry Heegle, which was done; but for fear that Mr. Heegle would not perform his part of the program, big-hearted, generous Brown went to the office of the clerk of the court and purchased the marriage license to make sure that the event would not miscarry. "Meddler" would like to ask, where, oh, where is there such a husband as John August Brown in the City of Superior? There might possibly be found one in the bachelor's club, but nowhere else!—W. Superior, Wis. Citizen.

The initiative of all wise and noble things comes and must come from individuals; generally at first from some one individual. The honor and glory of the average man is that he is capable of following that initiative; that he can respond internally to wise and noble things and be led to them with his eyes open.—Mill's "Liberty."

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 1394 CONGRESS ST., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, William Duff, 9 Carfin St., Glasgow Scotland.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

A SUSCRIBER writes to ask if we will accept stamps in payment for Lucifer and books. He objects to paying a war tax, and therefore does not want to buy money orders. YES. Stamps are as good as any other kind of money at our office.

WILL THE subscribers to "Hilda's Home," who have not yet paid for the books which they promised to take, let us hear from them? You need the books—we need the money. And if any who have paid for a book has not received it, we will send it on application. This book has been highly recommended as an aid to missionary work and should not be permitted to be idle. The price is $1 in cloth; 50 cents in paper.

In the Sunny South.

Saturday morning, Feb. 11, finds me at New Orleans, the commercial, social and political metropolis of the Gulf States. My last week's letter was written at the kindly hospitable home of our friends, S. A. and W. P. Fogg, near Thayer, Miss My sojourn at that place was one of the most enjoyable and helpful of my trip this year. Notwithstanding the sudden change of weather from spring to winter, soon after my arrival at Thayer, I found the air, the water and the general environment so conducive to health and comfort that the improvement in my condition during these six days was more marked than during any other period of equal length since leaving Chicago. Of the advantages of this place for colony purposes I propose to have more to say later on.

Bidding good-bye to our Thayer helpers, I made the short run of seventy miles to Ponchatoula, La., where I was met by three or four friends whose names are not wholly unknown to Lucifer's readers—J. Allen Evans, Virgie C. Moon, Samuel Moon and S. O. Bishop. The address of last-named is now at Hammond, La., formerly at Wichita, Kas. Hammond is the next station north of Ponchatoula, and while the train halted there for some ten minutes I was most agreeably surprised to hear my name called by a little man somewhat advanced in years, whose face had a slightly familiar look, and who introduced himself as S. O. Bishop. My surprise was so great that some seconds elapsed before I could fully realize that this man was really the same Bishop who, for a dozen years or more, has been a most faithful and earnest helper of Lucifer and its work. (Mem: Let no reader imagine that because we have a Bishop and a Pope among our patrons and helpers that there is any necessary connection between Lucifer and the Roman Catholic church or any other ecclesiastical organization.)

Next day at Ponchatoula I had the pleasure of a much longer interview with our Bishop, and also with a young friend whom he brought with him—B. Wade Hewett, a member of the firm of Hewett & Son, extensive nurserymen, formerly of Waupun, Wis., who have lately moved their entire business to Hammond, La. The Hewetts, while in Wisconsin were readers and helpers of Lucifer and now will receive the weekly visits of our Morning Star in their Louisiana home. That our friends Bishop and Hewett should be willing to take a day off and walk five miles here and back—ten miles in all—to meet and talk with Lucifer's editor, certainly speaks well for their earnestness in the cause of the reforms to which our Light Bringer is devoted.

Ponchatoula and vicinity seem well adapted to the business of supplying New Orleans and other large cities with berries and garden "truck", and also with eggs, poultry, milk and butter. Cabbages, lettuce and onions grow all winter without protection. Strawberries are ready for market in February and March and continue in bearing till July. Blackberries and dewberries grow wild in the woods and are much superior in size and quality to those grown in the latitude of Chicago. Oranges, figs, Japanese persimmons and many other semi-tropical fruits are successfully grown here. Peaches, grapes, pears and plums do well, but apples have to be imported.

Not wishing to tire the readers, and not wishing to monopolize Lucifer's space, I must bring this long letter to a close, and send it back from the next station—Pensacola, Fla., else it may be too late for next week's Lucifer. As these last lines are pencilled the train is fast bearing me through the pine forests of Southern Alabama. The lumber business seems to be the sole industry. But of this more anon.

IN CAMP AT LAKE HELEN, FLA.

Omitting for the present many things I meant to say in regard to my trip to this place, I find myself very pleasantly located on the second floor of the "Hotel Cassadaga," the largest hostelry at the much-advertised "Southern Cassadaga" camp ground. While somewhat disappointed as to the number of cottages and number of visitors in attendance I am not at all disappointed in regard to the beauty and healthfulness of the location. Situated 125 miles south of Jacksonville on, the A. & W. branch of the Florida East Coast railroad, about twenty miles inland from New Smyrna, one mile south of the railroad station at Lake Helen, overlooking a chain of small lakes, surrounded by hills covered with forests of tall pine trees, the location is all that could be desired as a health resort. A large sanitarium is in course of construction for the use of invalids needing special treatment.

The unprecedented cold of the past week or two has probably greatly diminished the attendance at this camp, the impression doubtless being general that hotels and boarding houses at the camp are not constructed with a view to resisting a temperature of ten or twelve degrees above zero. This impression, however, is true only in part. The hotel at which I am stopping is supplied with heating apparatus and with sleeping rooms and beds sufficiently warm for the comfort of the chronic invalid.

Arriving on the 14th, I found my old friend Prof. W. F. Peck, already on the ground, and officiating as one of the leading speakers. Prominent among the speakers now here are Mrs. C. Fanny Allyn of Stoneham, Mass.; Mrs. Clara Field Conant and Dr. Edward E. Conant of Virginia. Yesterday I had the pleasure of listening to a very fine address by C. Fanny Allyn, on the "Higher Education," and "Divine Providence"—subjects furnished by the audience. She also gave improvisations in verse upon subjects suggested by the audience and appropriate to the times and local conditions. It has been my fortune to hear many extemporaneous speakers, but among them all I think of few if any that for readiness, clearness of thought, and sprightliness of action and utterance, can surpass Mrs. Allyn. In religion, government and sociology she is reckoned as radical and fearless to a marked degree.

Am glad to say that the weather is again mild and spring-like. Three days of sunny skies, and of balmy, health-laden breezes have nearly obliterated all memory of the terrible "blizzard" that swept down upon the Gulf States from the frozen Northwest on Saturday and Sunday, the 11th and 12th of this month—a month that will doubtless be long remembered by the fruit growers in all the Southern states of the American union as the "record-breaker."

As this writing, Friday the 17th, I have heard nothing from Chicago for over a week. No Lucifer later than the issue of Feb. 4 has reached me, consequently I am feeling quite anxious to hear from home. Hoping that all the members of Lucifer's widely scattered family who may have been living in or near the pathway of the late storm, have escaped freezing to death, and also escaped serious loss of their animal or vegetable friends, I will close this my weekly word of greeting. M. HARMAN.

An Appeal for C. C. Moore.

The case of the editor of the "Blue Grass Blade" is to be appealed. Several members of the Ohio Liberal Society have taken the matter in hand and engaged lawyers, who will attempt to obtain a new trial. It appears that the case was wretchedly mismanaged. The real issue of free discussion was not defended at all. Moore writes from the penitentiary at Columbus that he is assistant in the printing office, has been permitted to retain his hair and beard, and is given good food and plenty of it. Altogether, one would judge from his letter that he is on a pleasant junketing trip. Nevertheless, his case should not be allowed to stand as a precedent for prosecutions of people who may in the future seriously defend the vital principle of free discussion.

An Anarchist Colony.

Most of Lucifer's readers are probably unaware of the existence of a community where the doctrines promulgated by Lucifer have become popular. Having visited many colonies, and having lived in two of them, first in the godless town of Liberal, Mo., where free lovers were persecuted and mobbed by Infidels calling themselves Liberals, and later in the Owen colony in Sinaloa, Mexico, where state socialists, with their referendum, rule, exercised all the brutal tyranny of a Czar, I have been prepared to expect nothing but a policy and practice of invasion of others' rights in any of these alleged reform colonies.

I had expected at Liberal, Mo., and in the Sinaloa colony to find freedom, but found not even toleration. I came to Lake Bay expecting to find discord and intolerance among a group of populists, socialists and communists calling themselves anarchists, yet not comprehending the principles of anarchism and practicing them still less. The unexpected confronts me here as forcibly as it did at Liberal and Sinaloa, for I find at last a community of people whose chief panacea for all social ills is more freedom.

This colony was started three years ago by three families, the Odells, Allens and Veritys, who withdrew from the Glennis colony. There are at present about sixty members. No attempt has been made to advertise the colony. Numbers and wealth are not what they are seeking so much as congenial companionship, a free life and a freer education of their children.

Harmony has not at all times prevailed in the colony. Some of the members were at one time disposed to ostracise certain radical free lovers, who, however, by force of constant discussion and by the example of their happier lives, not only broke down all opposition, but won converts into the ranks of the radicals, and for the first time in my life I find people becoming free lovers because it is fashionable. All questions are discussed openly before children of all ages, of both sexes. It would do you good to hear the experiences of those whose lives of monogamic discord have been changed into harmony by the introduction of more freedom. They accept the doctrines of freedom in the sex relations on the solid foundation of results obtained, of pain replaced by pleasure. Most of them look upon free love no longer as a theory to be argued upon, but as something to be demanded, as you would demand the right to breathe.

The chief occupations of the colonists are discussing social questions, cutting cord wood and saw logs and clearing land. Little quarrels have occurred occasionally, but in no case have I heard of any serious invasion of another's rights.

Many of the members have belonged to other colonies. Some were in Sinaloa; some left Ruskin, Tenn., because of the intolerance of the rulers there; others are from Equality. Remember this ye state socialist free lovers! You will be hunted like criminals from your own colonies.

All through the world's history little bands of people have gathered together to escape oppression, and every one of these little groups—except the anarchists—have ached to rule over somebody; have feared to trust liberty; have tried to heal the ulcer caused by oppression by applying more chains.

At Lake Bay the remedy is always more freedom. Some have come here disposed to govern, but that element does not prevail. I have been very careful to hear both sides and have listened attentively to enemies of the colony before venturing to express my opinion, and then I have drawn it very mild. Most reform colonies make the mistake of co-operating in everything. These people co-operate only where it is advantageous to do so and otherwise work as individuals.

Do not misunderstand me. This colony is by no means all that I could desire in any respect. They are merely moving in the right direction and are learning and teaching that great truth, that "Liberty is the mother, not the daughter of order"

HENRY YOUMANS

Lake Bay, Wash.

A Newspaper Canard.

A few weeks ago the "New York Sunday World" printed a very sensational story of the life and suicide of Eleanor Marx Aveling. The startling headlines were as follows: "Was Edward Aveling a Villain or a Visionary? Eleanor Marx, Original of Pinero's heroine in his most famous play, 'The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith,' pales its lurid fiction by her suicide for love. Her martyrdom to socialism. Dr. Aveling, who connived at her self-sought death, a——what?"

The article was throughout an attempt to prove an alleged resemblance between Eleanor Marx and "Mrs. Ebbsmith." I sent the article to George Bedborough, asking his opinion of it. In reply he writes:

"Mr. A. W. Pinero has written me emphatically contradicting the statement made by 'The New York World' to the effect that Mrs. Eleanor Marx Aveling was the original of the 'Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith.' Mr. Pinero denies that there is any basis whatever for the suggestion. GEORGE BEDBOROUGH."

The International Free Discussion League.

The International Free Discussion League is organized for the purpose of carrying on, encouraging and defending free discussion, oral and printed, of all problems that arise incidental to the social state, without any regard to their character, as it is believed by its founders that the utmost liberty of inquiry is essential to the development of wisdom in individual and collective life and action.

While the statutory laws respecting the free and public expression of thought and opinion have been largely modified, and in some few instances abolished during past years, yet, with those remaining still in force (witness the very recent unjust prosecutions for blasphemy and obscenity in England and the United States) laws which lie unrepealed, awaiting the call of the moral or religious bigot, there is a public opinion, narrow to the verge of fanaticism, which acts as a powerful check upon the wholly healthy movement of thought in the sphere of speech and publication. To meet this, and to successfully combat it through the mutual efforts of the friends of truth and progress, the League is formed. It is believed that by making a united stand, through organization, the prejudice and oppression now existing may be met and neutralized largely, and the prime interests of our lives freed from the shadows of ignorance and the mists of falsehood.

Freethought organizations in the past have taken their rise from and have developed chiefly in opposition to theological ideas and the resulting controls. The growth in the complexity of society during the last forty years has brought forward problems which, with the solution of the theological problem well under way, call for a freedom of speech and press more extensive than was before conceived of, and quite dwarfing in their gravity former problems, important though these were. The economic problems involved in land tenure, the relations of capital and labor, money, interest, etc.; the political questions raised by socialism and libertarianism; the problems of indvidual and public health, with the theories of disease and cure, including the vaccination theory, the sex problem, and the profound problems of morals or expediency in conduct, which involve all these others; these are occuping attention to a very remarkable degree today, and a new era of freethought has begun.....

All who believe in the necessity of freedom in thought in the search for truth, and in any and all spheres, all who would rather the truth should be found to be different from what they hold and believe, than that it should not be found at all; all who look to education and not to ignorance to determine the interests of life; all who want only fairness and courage in investigating the conditions of existence are earnestly invited to join the International Free Discussion League and use their influence as far as possible to further and secure its objects. The membership fee is only 75 cents per year. The organ of the League is "The Truth Seeker," published at 36 Villiers street, Bradford, England. Sample copy on receipt of name and address.....

The Organizing Secretary [William Francis Barnard] is prepared to lecture on subjects of interest to the League, and he will visit towns and cities in England, Scotland and Wales upon demand, to organize branches of the League. For further particulars address, The International Free Discussion League, 79 Markham Avenue Harehills, Leeds.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Realism in Art.

Clarence S. Darrow in "Arena."

It was only the vulgar superstition of the past that ever suggested that the reproduction of human forms in stone was an unholy work. Through long, dark centuries religion taught that the human form was vile and bad, and that the soul of man was imprisoned in a charnel house, unfit for human sight. They wounded, bruised and maimed their house of clay; they covered it with skins that under no circumstances could be removed, and many ancient saints lived and died without ever having looked upon the bodies nature gave them. The images of saints and martyrs, which in the name of religion were scattered through Europe, were covered with paint and clothes, and were nearly as hideous as the monks who placed them there.

When the condition of Europe and its religious thought is clearly understood, it is not difficult to imagine the reception that greeted the first dawn of modern realistic art. Sculpture and painting deified the material. It told of beauty in the human form which thousands of years of religious fanaticism had taught was bad and vile.

If the flesh was beautiful, what of the monks and priests who had hidden it from sight; who had kept it covered night and day through all their foolish lives; who maimed and bruised, cut and lacerated it for the glory of the spirit which they believed was chained within? The church had taught that the death of the flesh was the birth of the soul, and they therefore believed that the artist's resurrection of the flesh was the death of the soul.

This old religious prejudice, born of a musty, superstitious past, has slowly faded from the minds of men, but we find its traces even yet; the origin of the feeling against realistic art has well-nigh been forgot, but much of the feeling still remains. No one now would pretend to say that all the body was unholy or unfit for sight, and yet years of custom and inherited belief have made us think that a part is good and the rest is bad; that nature, in her work of building up the human form, has made one part sacred and another vile. It is easy to mistake custom for nature, and inherited prejudice for morality.

There is not a single portion of the human body which some people have not believed holy, and not a single portion which some have not believed vile. It was not shame that made clothing, but clothing that made shame. If we should eradicate from our beliefs all that inheritance and environment have given, it would be hard for us to guess how much would still remain Custom has made almost all things good and nearly all things bad, according to the whim of time and place. To find solid ground we must turn to nature, and ask what it is that conduces to the highest happiness and the longest life. The realistic artist cannot accept the popular belief, whatever that may be as to just where the dead line on the human body should be drawn that separates the sacred and profane.

A Remedy for Marital Ennui.

In Thomas Hardy's "Far From the Madding Crowd," several gossips are discussing the case of a man who married a sweet, beautiful woman and soon tired of her. Says one:

"The pore feller were faithful and true enough in his wish, but his heart would rove, do what he would. Aye, 'a spoke to me in real tribulation about it once. 'Coggan,' he said, 'I could never wish for a handsomer woman than I've got, but feeling as she's ticketed as my lawful wife, I can't help my wicked heart wandering, do what I will.' But at last I believe he cured it by making her take off her wedding ring and calling her by her maiden name as they sat together after the shop was shut, and so 'a would get to fancy she was only his sweetheart, and not married to him at all. And so soon as he could thoroughly fancy he was doing wrong and committing the seventh, 'a got to like her as well as ever, and they lived on, a perfect example of mutel love."

The Chicago Monday Lectures.

At Central Music Hall, Professor George D. Herron of Iowa College, will speak as follows:

On eight Sunday evenings, beginning Feb. 19, at 8 p. m., Professor Herron will repeat the remarkable course of lectures delivered in Willard Hall last fall. Topic: "Between Cæsar Jesus."

On eight Monday noons, beginning Feb. 20, 12 o'clock sharp, Professor Herron will speak on "Municipal Ideals."

During this course Professor Herron will preach Sunday morning at 11, at People's Church, McVicker's Theatre. Admission free.

Sociologic Lesson. No. LXXXV.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

THE AWARD TO LABOR. The Council rates the different series in advance, by the mean ballot, explained in No. 82. Guided by the previous awards and the results, each member designates upon his ballot such a rate for each serie as he thinks will secure the requisite amount of labor and skill. If the award to any serie is reduced, it will tend to diminish the labor portion, for a greater part of the time, to more profitable employment.

The rates for the series and the rates for the groups are fixed in advance by the Council; but the rates for individuals should be made in the group councils at the end of each week. This rating, immediately after the work is done, will more certainly reward diligence and care, and reduce the award when there is negligence or failure. Members would be guided in the selection of their occupations by different motives; their attraction for the kind of work; the amount of the award they expect to receive; the company they would enjoy in the different groups. If they found themselves insufficiently rated in one occupation, they would be likely to find other employment where they would be more appreciated.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. By Herbert Spencer. 525 pages. Style of binding, paper, etc., similar to "Data of Ethics." Our stock copy of "First Principles" to any one sending us $1 for a NEW subscriber, and 13 cents for postage on the book.

In the "funnygraph" of one of Chicago's great dailies we find the following bit of fine humor: "Rich Little Girl—I got a diamond ring and a big doll and a gold necklace today. Poor Little Girl—That ain't nothin', I had meat for dinner."

The man who could see anything "funny" in that would welcome another's sorrow with a wink and shriek with laughter over the death of his neighbor's child. "'Tis true, 'tis pity; and pity 'tis, 'tis true."—Cassville, Wis "Index."

The western movement against the employment of married women as school teachers should also embrace the principle that no bachelor teachers should be employed. If you refuse to employ married women you discourage marriage. But refuse, at the same time, to employ unmarried men, and you encourage marriage, thus balancing the diverse tendencies and doing justice all around. The western movement is idiotic, however, whether directed against women or men.—Springfield "Republican."

The "St. Louis Chronicle" says: "Police Magistrate Poole of New York, has discarded the old dog-eared, greasy Bible which hundreds of witnesses and prisoners have kissed. 'I'm not going to use the Bible any more,' he said. 'The Bible is nothing but a breeder of disease when used in this way. All sorts of bums and diseased persons kiss it, and it is dangerous to have about.'"

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mrs. J. Schmidt, Lowell, Wash.—Enclosed find one dollar, for which send me "Hilda's Home," bound in cloth. I cannot tell you how much I enjoy reading your paper. Since I began reading your paper I am not the same woman. It has thoroughly aroused me. This is the freedom that every woman should try to attain, and not the other preached by the so-called "new woman." I wish that every woman in America could read and be benefitted as I have been—we would be a happier people. Hoping that you for many years will be able to keep on your noble work and with my best regards to you and your little daughter,

Ella Slater, St. Louis, Mo.—We are so glad to have had the pleasure of meeting and becoming so well acquainted with your most earnest and honorable father, and hope we may meet you also in the near future. We enjoyed your father's visit more than words can express; and would be glad if he could return by way of our city. We enjoy reading Lucifer more than any other progressive paper, and we take several. A man who can write such inspiring words as those in "A Free Man's Creed," and "Motherhood in Freedom" ought to be born again so he could live to be two hundred years old. I do all I can to try to enlighten my sister women (and men also) and have talked to a preacher's wife (a patient) until I could see she was ready for the perusal of "Hilda's Home." I gave it to her, and she, poor woman, with tears in her eyes, pronounced it perfect.

J. Allen Evans, Ponchatoula, La.—The event of my life has come and gone. Your illustrious father, our dear, beloved editor of the grandest paper in the world arrived in this place on Thursday night on a belated train; for two nights I had watched the train for him; others too were on the lookout for him. Parties at Hammond caught him in the coach as his train waited for another train to meet and pass them there. I esteem it one of the most enjoyable events of my life that the long-deferred pleasure of meeting the editor of the Light Bearer was fulfilled at last. I entertained him one night and Friday we dined with Virgie C. Moon who, with her consort, was at my house to receive him on his arrival. He enjoyed his meals at my humble quarters, and I reveled in every moment of his presence, and I felt that such grand characters compensated us and made life worth living. I want to say to the many hundreds who are anxious about the recovery of our chieftain, that he ate heartily and assimilated his food while here, and was looking quite well and when I saw him off on the train for Florida he was cheerful and apparently filled with fond anticipation of meetings with other congenials in the land of the orange. I am glad he is beyond the blight of the present severe cold blast. I feel that I am a better man for having met Moses Harman.

Elsie Cole Wilcox, Lawrence, Wash.—"Irene" came a few days ago, and I have just finished reading it. In some respects I regard it as inferior to "Hilda's Home," and yet, as a clear exposition of our faith, giving every conceivable argument pro and con, it beats everything I ever read. Of course, as you know, I am too much "of the earth earthy" to fully endorse the spiritual part of it, but for the material, practical part I have only hearty commendation. I thank you for enabling me to read it, for if you had substituted the other books, as I gave you permission to do, I might never have made the acquaintance of "Irene." And now may I ask a favor? Will you tell me if the sequel was ever published? I do not remember having seen it advertised. And will you give me the author's present address? I dislike to trouble you now while you are doing double duty, but I am eager to learn more of Irene's philosophy. I trust your dear father will gain new life in the Sunny South.

By the way, I must tell you of a little namesake of yours here. She is a sweet little girl (of Norwegian parentage), one year old, who bears the name of Edna Lillian Dale, the Lillian being my contribution. She is very sweet and pretty, and I hope will grow up worthy of her name.

[The sequel to "Irene" has not been published. Mrs. Fowler hopes to be able to publish it in the near future. The author's address is Torresdale, Pa. The fifteen copies which she donated to Lucifer were sold long ago, but we still fill all orders at 50 cents each.]

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the lancet deep into the ulcerous sores of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1.50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN
IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic as it is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Civilized "Sport."

Ah, what fine sport on the night Broadway!
Sport for you girls whom the fools call gay!
Leering and begging the price of a drink,
Watchful of eye—with a tread half slink!
The "centrals" are out and the ward man won't shirk,
"Moral spasm D. D." says "disguised men must work"
(A discharge if the officer dares to refuse),
If his store clothes deceive you look out for "cop" shoes;
Slouch, creep and crawl to a dive, if you may;
Fight, if you're caught, like a wild beast at bay!
Ho! for the sport of the night Broadway!

Ho! for the sport of the night Broadway!
Where can you find such a hunt in the day?
Sport for the pickpocket plying his trade,
Your peril for him a vacation has made.
Sport for the scribe; what a "story" you make!
Funnier by far than the item he'd "fake."
Sport for the officer seeking his "stars;"
You're making his record behind prison bars.
Isms have banned you and ologies say
Man made the debt, but woman must pay!
Ho! for the sport of the night Broadway!

Ho! for the sport of the night Broadway!
Maudie and Ruby and Trixy and May.
A preacher is stalking you, jingling the wage
Paid by dull dupes for his fine "Christian" rage.
He'll send out a rosy-cheeked Sunday school lad,
Bid him flirt with you—wantons—then swear that you're "bad;"
Cheat men and blik 'em and rob if you can!
If you don't you'll be cruelly whipped by a "man."
Wolfish-eyed "souteneur," watching to prey
From the time you turn out till the time you decay.
Ho! for the sport of the night Broadway!

Ho! for the sport of the night Broadway!
Hark: 'tis the eve of a God's birthday!
Christmas chimes, here, on the crispy air,
Toy-laden children are laughing there;
Happy mothers and daughters pure
Guarded by love and well sheltered from lure,
Freedom of purse for the "waifs of the street,"
But no mercy for Magdalen prone at their feet!
No charity! Faith, lost! and hope?—not a ray!
Death! if from that one commandment you stray!
Ah! for the woes of the night Broadway!

ENVOI.

Father and mother and maker of laws,
Priest and policeman and pharisee—pause!
But for his, friend of Magdalen's, mercy today
Your daughter's the quarry on night Broadway.

Darwin, Weismann* and Harman.

BY R. B. KERR.

It may seem strange to write the names of these three men together, for in temperament, ideas and aims there is a great difference between the two chief biologists of the century and the prophet of Chicago. Yet it is likely that posterity will often mention the three names together, because of their connection with one great problem. Darwin and Weismann between them have propounded the most difficult of all the riddles of social reform; Harman is the man who has found the answer.

Darwin's great work in life was to prove that the main cause of progress among all animals and plants has been in the past, and now is, natural selection, or the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence. Deriving from Malthus the well-established law that all living creatures multiply so fast that they tend continually to outrun the means of subsistence, he shows that this leads to a struggle for existence, and that in this struggle the fittest tend to survive and to propagate the next generation, while the comparatively unfit tend to disappear in the struggle and to die leaving fewer or no posterity. The forms of the struggle for existence vary. In former times war was one of the most important, being the constant business of our savage ancestors, and continually sweeping, not only individuals, but whole tribes at a time entirely out of existence. Today disease, want, exposure and the other hardships of poverty are perhaps the most important factors, sweeping away, as they do, about a third of the population before they get the length of having any children at all. But whatever the factors may be at any given time, there is no doubt about the facts. The delicate, weak, stupid, and generally incompetent, tend to go to the wall; the strong in mind and body tend on the whole to survive, to be the fathers and mothers of the next generation and to transmit their qualities to them. Such is the Darwinian law of natural selection, which is now admitted by all persons whose opinion is worth anything to be the chief cause of the evolutionary progress among plants, animals and men.

The revelation of this truth in 1859 greatly shocked many philanthropic persons, although the great majority have not even yet begun to understand it. People began to cast about for some means of rescuing mankind from the horrible evils of the struggle for existence, and naturally the method hit upon was that of the practical Malthusians. "It," said they, "we are always multiplying beyond the means of subsistence, and bringing these dreadful evils on ourselves, let us stop multiplying beyond the means of subsistence. If we limit our population we may not evolve so fast, but we shall at least have a better time of it."

This sounded like very good philosophy, but unfortunately Weismann and other biologists spoiled the whole thing by making a further discovery. They discovered that without natural selection or some other means of keeping the unfit from propagating, the race would not stand still, but would enter upon a career of continuous degeneration. As Benjamin Kidd expresses it: "If all the individuals in every generation in any species were allowed to equally propagate their kind, the average of each generation would continually tend to fall below the average of the generation which preceded it, and a process of slow but steady degeneration would ensue." ("Social Evolution," Chap. 2) Space will not allow me to show why biologists are gen erally adopting this belief; suffice it to say that they are so doing.

*The name Weismann ought only to be spelled with one "s" although it is often spelled with two. It is the German for "Wiseman." If it had a second "s" it would mean "Whiteman."

Now, indeed, we are between the devil and the deep sea. On the one hand we have the choice of going on as we are doing, and we shall evolve; but our evolution will be founded on hunger, cold, and misery. On the other hand we may decide to stop the struggle for existence by limiting our increase; but that way degeneration lies, unless we can find some method of selecting the fittest parents without the aid of natural selection.

However, hope springs eternal in the human breast, and many people are now in the field with various suggestions for artificial selection of parents. Jane H. Clapperton, for instance, in "Scientific Meliorism," tells us that we must substitute "birth of the fittest" for survival of the fittest. But unfortunately, the first writers did not propose any effective method of getting this done. Some proposed that nobody should be allowed to have children without a medical certificate of fitness; but I fear the race would rather degenerate than submit to that. Others proposed that the unfit should voluntarily abstain from parenthood. But would the unfit agree to that? and even if they would, would the unfit know they were the unfit?

At this point Moses Harman appeared on the scene and propounded the true solution. His solution is the free selection by women of the fathers of their children. "Let every woman who wishes to have a child be absolutely free to select its father," said Moses Harman, "then the problem is solved."

That selection of fathers is an efficient cause of evolution is shown by the history of our domestic animals. Among our sheep, cattle and horses, there is hardly any struggle for existence; for, however many there are, we are glad to give them all the food, shelter and attention they require. Yet during the past five or six centuries these animals have evolved far faster than men or any race of wild animals. A fat sheep is now a much bigger animal than a fat sheep five centuries ago, and a like change for the better has occurred among horses and cattle. This has been accomplished by careful selection, and it has been chiefly selection of fathers, not of mothers.

The only remaining question is, would women on the average select the fittest men for fathers? Surely there can be no doubt about it. We all know that the average woman admires men who are tall, strong, resolute and handsome, more than she admires men who lack these qualities. Such virtues as tact and sympathy must always give a man an advantage with a woman. Whether the average woman is much attracted by intellect may be doubted, but undoubtedly she likes to be associated with a man whose intellect has made him distinguished in the eyes of the community. I doubt if there is a single advantage of mind or body which would not be serviceable to a man in winning a woman.

The more I consider the matter, the clearer it becomes to me that Moses Harman has solved the most important of all the problems of human progress.

The Wine-Press.

From "Dreams," by Olive Schreiner.

We came where hell opened into a plain, and a great house stood there. Marble pillars upheld the roof, and white marble steps led up to it. The wind of heaven blew through it. Only at the back hung a thick curtain. Fair men and women feasted at long tables. They danced, and I saw the robes of women flutter in the air and heard the laugh of strong men. What they feasted with was wine; they drew it from large jars which stood somewhat in the background, and I saw the wine sparkle as they drew it.

And I said to God, "I should like to go up and drink." And God said, "Wait." And I saw men coming into the Banquet House; they came in from the back and lifted the corner of the curtain at the sides and crept in quickly; and they let the curtain fall behind them; they bore great jars they could hardly carry. And the men and women crowded round them, and the newcomers opened their jars and gave them of the wine to drink; and I saw that the women drank even more greedily than the men. And when others had well drunken they set the jars among the old ones beside the wall, and took their places at the table. And I saw that some of the jars were very old and mildewed and dusty, but others had still drops of new must on them and shone from the furnace.

And I said to God, "What is that?" For amid the sound of the singing, and over the dancing of feet, and over the laughing across the wine-cups I heard a cry.

And God said, "Stand a way off."

And he took me where I saw both sides of the curtain. Behind the house was a wine press where the wine was made. I saw the grapes crushed, and I heard them cry. I said, "Do not they on the other side hear it.?"

God said, "The curtain is thick; they are feasting."

And I said, "But the men who came in last. They saw?"

God said, "They let the curtain fall behind them—and they forget!"

I said, "How came they by their jars of wine?"

God said, "In the treading of the press these are they who came to the top; they have climbed out over the edge, and filled their jars from below, and have gone into the house."

And I said, "And if they had fallen as they climbed——?"

God said, "They had been wine."

I stood a way off watching in the sunshine, and I shivered. God lay in the sunshine watching too.

Then there rose one among the feasters who said, "My brethren, let us pray!"

And all the men and women rose; and strong men bowed their heads, and mothers folded their little children's hands together, and turned their faces upwards, to the roof. And he who first had risen stood at the table head, and stretched out both his hands, and his beard was long and white, and his sleeves and his beard had been dipped in wine; and because the sleeves were wide and full they held much wine, and it dropped down upon the floor.

And he cried, "My brothers and my sisters, let us pray."

And all the men and women answered, "Let us pray."

He cried, "For this fair banquet-house, we thank thee, Lord."

And all the men and women said, "We thank thee, Lord."

"Thine is this house, dear Lord."

"Thine is this house."

"For us thou made it."

"For us."

"Oh, fill our jars with wine, dear Lord."

"Our jars with wine."

"Give peace and plenty in our time, dear Lord."

"Peace and plenty in our time——" I said to God, "Whom is it they are talking to?" God said, "Do I know whom they speak of?" And I saw they were looking up at the roof; but out in the sunshine God lay.

"——dear Lord!"

"Dear Lord."

"Our children's children, Lord, shall rise and call thee blessed."

"Our children's children, Lord."—— I said to God, "The grapes are crying!" God said, "Still I hear them"—— "shall call thee blessed."

"Shall call thee blessed.

"Pour forth more wine upon us, Lord."

"More wine.

"More wine."

"More wine!"

"Wine!!"

"Wine!!"

"Wine!!!"

"Dear Lord!"

Then men and women sat down and the feast went on. And mothers poured out wine and fed their little children with it, and men held the cup to women's lips and cried, "Beloved! drink!" and women filled their lovers' flagons and held them up; and yet the feast went on.

And after a while I looked and saw the curtain that hung behind the house moving.

I said to God, "Is it a wind?"

God said, "A wind."

And it seemed to me that against the curtain I saw pressed the forms of men and women. And after a while the feasters saw it move, and they whispered one to another. Then some rose and gathered the most worn out cups, and into them they put what was left at the bottom of other vessels. Mothers whispered to their children, "Do not drink all, save a little drop when you have drunk." And when they had collected all the dregs they slipped the cups out under the bottom of the curtain without lifting it. After a while the curtain left off moving.

I said to God, "How is it so quiet?"

He said, "They have gone away to drink it."

I said, "They drink it—their own!"

God said, "It comes from the other side of the curtain, and they are very thirsty."

Then the feast went on, and after a while I saw a small, white hand slipped in below the curtain's edge along the floor; and it motioned towards the wine jars.

And I said to God, "Why is that hand so bloodless?"

And God said, "It is a wine-pressed hand."

And men saw it and started to their feet; and women cried, and ran to the great wine jars, and threw their arms around them, and cried, "Ours, our own, our beloved!" and twined their long hair about them.

I said to God, "Why are they frightened of that one small hand?"

God answered, "Because it is so white."

And men ran in a great company towards the curtain, and struggled there. I heard them strike upon the floor. And when they moved away the curtain hung smooth and still; and there was a small stain upon the floor.

I said to God, "Why do they not wash it out?"

God said, "They cannot."

And they took small stones and put them down along the edge of the curtain to keep it down. Then the men and women sat down again at the tables.

And I said to God, "Will those stones keep it down?"

God said, "What think you?"

I said, "If the wind blew——"

God said, "If the wind blew?"

And the feast went on.

And suddenly I cried to God, "If one should rise among them, even of themselves, and start up from the table and should cast away his cup, and cry, 'My brothers and sisters, stay! what is it that we drink?'——and with his sword should cut in two the curtain, and holding wide the fragments, cry, 'Brothers, sisters, see! it is not wine, not wine! not wine! My brothers, oh, my sisters—!' and he should overturn the——"

God said, "Be still!——see there."

I looked: before the banquet-house, among the grass, I saw a row of mounds, flowers covered them, and gilded marble stood at their heads. I asked God what they were.

He answered, "They are the graves of those who rose up at the feast and cried."

And I asked God how they came there.

He said, "The men of the banquet-house rose and cast them down backwards."

I said, "Who buried them?"

God said, "The men who cast them down."

I said, "How came it that they threw them down, and then set marble over them?"

God said, "Because the bones cried out, they covered them."

And among the grass and weeds I saw an unburied body lying; and I asked God why it was.

God said, "Because it was thrown down only yesterday. In a little while, when the flesh shall have fallen from its bones, they will bury it also, and plant flowers over it."

And the feast went on.

Dianism Further Explained.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

As the subject of Dianism becomes more and more discussed by people in general, it is seen that a great many are rejecting it because they do not understand it. The impression of most of them seems to be that a Dianite is ready to embrace or be embraced by a nude lover with as little reserve as one would feel at receiving any other kind of love caresses. But this is all a mistake. Dianism was written as advice to the married. It is intended to show that wedlock is no license to lust; that there is no need of sexing unless children are desired.

The craving for the complete sex act is stimulated and increased by yielding to desire, just as the craving for intoxicants is. So if the husband and wife diffuse and exchange sexual magnetism with each by nude embraces or any other form of love embraces, remembering all the while that this will fully satisfy their desires—if they do so will it, they will soon become true Dianites. The same rule will apply to unmarried lovers, if they incline to go that far in mutual contact one with another. But it is supposed that the great majority of lovers will find affection, comradeship, love and sympatby all-sufficient, and there will be no more desire for nude contact than our common social rules admit of.

There was a time when an infidel was supposed to be one who violated all the rules of decency and went about cursing and exclaiming, "There ain't any God," etc. Twenty-five years ago when we came here hundreds of people thought us little better than savages and they even wondered how we acted when we ate! No one here had ever seen an infidel, and they had formed their opinion of them from the pious canards in tracts and Sunday-school literature.

Free love and Dianism are now going through the crude stage of existence, and are being misunderstood in the same way.

The Retort Courteous.

G. E. Macdonald in "Truth Seeker."

The New York "Tribune" has had something to say about "the essential immorality of modern anti-religious socialism," dragging into discussion the names of Mr. and Mrs. Aveling of London, both of whom are dead. "The Christian Advocate," which keeps a gob of mud on hand to throw at George Eliot whenever some one exposes that unbelieving woman to the editor's view, improves the occasion for this fling:

"In its article the 'Tribune' has invented a phrase worth preserving: 'Mrs. Aveling—let her be called Mrs. Aveling by courtesy.' George Eliot, 'let her be called Mrs. Lewes by courtesy.'"

Yes, it is a happy phrase, and does good service in the cases cited. Let us have the courtesy to call people by the names they prefer, whether their belief is our belief or not. But the phrase is not always serviceable. For instance, the Virgin Mary—by what stretch of courtesy can you call her Mrs. Anybody? And yet she was farther from being a maid than either Marian Evans or Eleanor Marx. Will the editor of the "Advocate" furnish a phrase "worth preserving" for use in cases like hers? or will he do better—i. e., keep his phallic system to himself and shut up?

"'Tis True, 'Tis Pity."

Chicago: "Have you a society for the suppression of vice in your city?" New York: "Yes, we have such an organization." Chicago: "And is it accomplishing its aim?" New York: "Well, I should say it was. We have more suppressed vice among us now than at any previous time in our history."

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

M. FLORENCE JOHNSON has returned to Chicago from a lecturing trip in Ohio. She will be glad to see both old and new pupils, and other friends. Further report will appear next week. Address her at this office.

In Camp Near Lake Helen, Fla.

I sent to Lucifer last week a very brief account of my arrival at this place, and first impressions thereof. I have now been here ten days, and with the exception of two or three days of clouds and more or less rain, the weather has been all that could be desired.

The sun rises here considerably before six o'clock, "Central" time, and sets about half-past five. A noticeable peculiarity of this semi-tropical climate is that there is comparatively no twilight. Many stars that never rise above the horizon in the latitude of Chicago are visible here—one, at least, of the first magnitude, Canopus by name, nightly shines with great brilliance in the southern sky. To a northerner it seems a little odd to see the moon directly overhead when at meridian, instead of considerably south of the zenith, as with us in the higher latitudes. The sun also, is much nearer the zenith at midday, and seen now from the highlands on which the camp is located it seems nearly high enough for a northern midsummer.

The daily meetings at the "Auditorium" have almost invariably been of a nature quite interesting to any one who is dissatisfied with present social conditions and who is earnestly enquiring for "a more excellent way." On Sunday afternoon, Feb. 19, Prof. W. F. Peck, of St. Louis, delivered a fine address on "Evolution"—physical, mental, psychic, spiritual. C. Fanny Allyn of Stoneham, Mass., in the forenoon of the same day, answered many questions propounded by the audience, prominent among which questions was, "What is the difference between orthodoxy and spiritualism?" From the standpoint of the speaker there are nearly if not quite as many points of difference between Spiritualism and orthodox Christianity as between the latter and what is called freethought or rationalism, as expounded by R. G. Ingersoll, T. B. Wakeman, D. M. Bennett, Prof. Draper and the modern religious iconoclasts generally. A very noteworthy feature of Mrs. Allyn's discourses is her habit of giving impromptu answers in rhyme to questions proposed by her audiences. These answers are given with a readiness, appropriateness, clearness and beauty of diction, correctness as to rhyme and measure, and withal such dramatic effectiveness that her audiences are amazed, if not enthused and entranced.

By invitation from the president of the association, who is also chairman of the meetings, Mr. W. E. Bond, of Willoughby, Ohio, I had the privilege of occupying the platform Tuesday forenoon of this week. My subject was, "The Ascent of Life—How Evolution Evolves." The main purpose and drift of my talk was to show the importance of woman's work as race-builder and the necessity of giving to mothers absolute control of their own person, and also the necessity of supplying mothers with the best possible conditions—environments—while perfecting their maternal functions, if we would have racial progress, or real lasting reform in any department of human life.

The lecture called out considerable discussion from the audience. Mrs. Emma J. Huff, one of the principal stockholders and managers of the association, thought the motherhood question would settle itself when women become free financially and industrially. She urged her hearers to concentrate their efforts upon the work of reforming our financial and industrial systems so that no woman would be dependent financially upon a husband or upon any one else.

As this is one of the most common of the criticisms or objections to Lucifer's methods of reform work, our readers will please bear with me while I state in substance if not in exact words my answer to Mrs. Huff.

While fully admitting the importance of financial and industrial reform as a condition or factor in woman's emancipation from sex-slavery, I ask, in all candor and earnestness, how are you going to free woman financially so long as mothers give birth to voters such as now compose the rank and file of political parties? They have rights who dare to take them. If mothers continue to submit to invasion of their persons—if they cannot muster courage or sense enough to demand and preempt their natural right to self-ownership, how can we expect that their sons will have courage enough or sense enough to demand and preempt their right to an equitable financial system, or to an equal share of nature's opportunities? It is an axiomatic truth that the governmental institutions of any nation are as good and bad as the masses who endure those institutions. No government can last that has not the active or passive support of the great majority of its subjects. If this be true, and all human experience proves it, then the only true and logical way to make better governmental institutions is to make better people. The only natural way to make better people is by better heredity, by stirpiculture, by pre-natal education. Post-natal education has failed in all the past, and, judging the future by the past, it will continue to fail. What is "bred in the bone" cannot be coaxed out or beaten out of the flesh. "To reform a man one must begin with his grandmother." Our reformatory work in all the past has been surface work. We have lopped off branches and allowed the root of the tree of evil to remain. The realm of causes must now receive our attention instead of the realm of effects. Right generation, right gestation or right pre-natal education will prevent the need of "regeneration," that patent "nostrum" upon which the Christian system has been built, and which we all know has ever proved a disastrous failure.

Mrs. Huff advises us to direct the vibrations of our thought-force upon the "heads of departments," upon the rulers of our land. Would it not be more sensible and more effective to direct these vibrations upon the minds—the intellects and the hearts of the mothers of our land? Of all human emotions mother love is the most powerful, most unselfish, most constant, most enduring. Let mother love be supplemented with mother wisdom. Let women refuse to become the mothers of unwelcome children. Let no woman become a mother until her right to self-ownership is practicalized, and let no man be a father until the right of every child to be born well is admitted by all to be the most important of all human rights—then the car of human progress will move onward and upward, as it never moved before.

M. HARMAN.

A Practical Question.

I do not not think that the letter from T. R. L., California, (see "Various Voices") was written for publication, but I thought it would interest our readers and do the writer no harm. It is of interest as showing the natural love of and desire for children which I believe the majority of women feel. In the same mail that brought this letter was one from another state, telling me of a young girl who is about to become a mother. She is the "daughter of one of the best families in town," I am told, and I am appealed to for advice and to help avert the terrible disgrace which threatens this girl and her family. Now if it were as easy for these two women to be together as for the letters to come to me at the same time what a blessing it would be! This was my thought as I read the second letter, and it has caused me to think of a plan which may be made to do good, and which at least can do no harm to suggest.

I know that there are many good, loving, broad-minded motherly women all over the country who will read these words. Is it possible for any one or any number of these to offer a home to despairing women during pregnancy and parturition? Are there any who can take such a girl and help her to regain her self-respect and hope and happiness?

I do not believe there is any more important work than that of saving a new life from being born of a despairing and desperate mother. Now my plan is this:—If any woman who reads this feels herself able to take such a prospective mother into her home and treat her with the respect and consideration which she would give to a daughter or a sister, I hope she will send me her name. Then when I am asked for help, I can let the woman who has the home to offer know the circumstances and she can decide whether she will take the girl. I have had probably a dozen such appeals for help in the last few years, and I have been able to help to arrange favorable conditions in some of the cases. But the difficulty always has been caused by my not knowing oft he right people at the right time.

Ever since I have been old enough to think of the woman and child question I have had a dream of what I would like to do, but it is improbable that I shall ever have money enough to realize that dream. If we are unable to do great things we should be glad to do the little we can, and if I can be the medium of communication that shall help even one child to the heritage of a happy birth I shall be proud of, though not content with, my work.

What do you think? and what can you do?

LILLIAN HARMAN.

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

People waste a great deal of time in arguing for and against theories of what is "natural" for women. It may be of interest to look back over the pages of history to see the various stages through which they have reached their present development, just as it is interesting to "look up" the derivation of words. But because an emotion may be "natural" at one stage of development is no reason why women should feel or simulate it under changed conditions. The tail is "natural" to the tadpole in the pond; but will anyone maintain that therefore the frog must drag a tail around after him as he hops on dry land?

Perhaps our readers will think we have "got religion" when they have read the poem on the first page. Really, I think Lackaye's words form a true picture of the conditions of the "night Broadway," as well as of night in any of our cities. The fact that he drags in a lame conclusion does not greatly lessen the force of the picture, though one instinctively asks, If it is true that only through the mercy of Christ are the daughters of the hunters spared, what shall we say of Christ's "mercy" which permits the weak and ignorant and unfortunate "Magdalen" to be hunted? If it is possible for Lackaye's God to save one daughter it is possible for him to save all. If he saves one and does not save all, he is an infinite fiend.

> Father and mother and maker of laws,
> Priest and policeman and pharisee—pause!
> The Magdalen spare. You may yet see the day
> Your daughter's the quarry on dark Broadway.

Maternal love is a beautiful emotion, and is necessary to the development of the race. But it is not the duty of a woman to pretend to feel it when she does not. The woman who does not naturally love and sympathize with children should never become a mother, and she will not if properly educated and left free to choose for herself. It is affirmed that it is every woman's "duty to society" to become a mother and simulate love for her children if she is incapable of feeling love for them. It is as great a wrong to a child to starve its emotional nature on counterfeit affection as to poison its physical system with adulterated food. I think a woman who is not interested in children misses a very great joy out of her life, just as one born color-blind is deprived of the enjoyment of much beauty. But we would not say to a color-blind man, "It is your duty to paint a picture," and force him to do so. We would know that even should his efforts not result in a hideous daub, there would be no soul, no life, in his picture. Yet society says to the love-blind woman, "It is your duty to create a child!" Is it any wonder that so often her efforts are worse than wasted?

"Straws show which way the wind blows," and it is in the little matters of every day life that we manifest whether our professed love of liberty is a part of ourselves or merely a "glittering generality." For instance, an acquaintance of mine entered a group of friends who were discussing the social question. All thought they believed in freedom. Said one man, "Of course we all are promiscuous." The others did not agree with him, however. When my friend started away she shook hands with all in parting and kissed one. Immediately the man who believed all were promiscuous protested against her favoritism. This brought on a discussion of the question. One man said he would not kiss a woman in the presence of other women—he would consider that an act of discourtesy. Others took the conventional ground that any kissing in public was bad taste. Surely it should be a question for the taste of the people who want to do the kissing, to decide. If they mutually agree that it tastes good, it should taste neither good nor bad to others. Personally, I do not desire promiscuity in kissing or in anything else. But why should I protest against promiscuous kissing by the man I have quoted, so long as the promiscuous kissees do not object?

The Life-Giving Power of Love.*

Modern science has revolutionized the practice of medicine, has changed the outer and inner man, has brought about changes inconceivable. We can incubate babes or chicks and call back to earth the fleeting life, but no change has been wrought in the method of reproduction. It is the same today as it was in the days of Romeo and Juliet, the same as it was in the days of Father Adam and Mother Eve. The command "Increase and multiply" would not have sufficed to populate the earth had it been merely a command. That men and women are not fond of obeying commands is proved by the fact every command in the decalogue has been broken time and again, but the command to increase and multiply has been fulfilled persistently since the dawn of creation. It is not fulfilled because it is a command, however, but because of the acme of pleasure, the superlative delight, the riotous rapture accompanying its fulfillment. In the higher forms of animal and vegetable life the union of the two sexes is necessary for the reproduction of life. In human beings it is more than a mere physical union of bodies; it is a rushing together of souls in superlative pleasure and sympathetic passion in a whirlpool of delirious delight. Such at least is the case under favorable conditions where the desire for the union is mutual and all but irresistible. In such cases there is nothing degrading in the act. It is the most glorious function of manhood and womanhood. It is that which brings forth into life the innocent babe, and it is an insult to humanity as well as to Mother Nature herself to call such a union a crime or denounce it as shameful when it is a mutual act in which the rapture of both persons concerned is reciprocal.

The paramount strength of the sex passion, without which reproduction would cease, is well set forth in Ella Wheeler Wilcox's poem "Delilah" where the woman exclaims if such passion is a sin she would willingly clasp her lover to her bosom and drop down with him to "sweet hell."

*Part of an address to medical students by A. Goodfellow, Ph. D.

Another illustration of the power of sex love is found in the old story of Pygmalion and Galatea. Pygmalion was an artist who was considered impervious to the seductive charms of the daughters of Eve. He was wedded to his art and thought he had repressed all his carnal inclinations. But Nature resents such an outrage and the fires of passion which he thought he had quenched were merely smouldering in his bosom. One day he betook himself to the task of making a marble statue of a beautiful woman. He made the statue as nearly as possible like he thought Nature intended woman to be made, and following the example of Nature, of course he made it with no clothing, for "Beauty unadorned is adorned the most." Coldly serene he labored at his task and saw the block of white stone gradually assume the form of a beautiful woman. So intent was he on his art that no fire of carnal passion heated his blood and sent it rushing through feverish veins. He felt himself as passionless as the cold marble before him. But when his task was completed, and the form of a perfect woman stood before him as if ready to palpitate with life, the smouldering fires of his manhood began to glow. He gazed on the twin white hemispheres forming the statue's bosom, and they seemed to speak to him of possible maternity. The lips seemed to call for kisses and the body for caresses. As he looked in wondering admiration on his creation he felt a change in his own person.

Instead of the coldly serene artist he felt himself transformed into a passionate man with a capacity—yea, more—an imperious demand for woman's love. It was new to him; he had never experienced such a feeling before. He felt his blood boiling in his veins and his temples throbbed and ached. He gasped for breath and uttered a prayer to the gods. His sleeping passion now having been thoroughly aroused he clasped the statue in his arms in a frenzy of despairing love and implored the gods to change it into a living woman. He pressed his scorching lips to the lips of the statue expecting to find them cool and soothing, but his brain reeled in a delirium of joy when his kiss was returned with the moist and clinging lips of a passionate woman. He clasped her closer in his arms, and the woman—now no longer marble—returned his embrace. Fearing he must be mad or dreaming he passed his hands over ever every inch of her body to satisfy himself that the gods had really answered his prayer. Then and there linked to an angel-mortal of his own creation for the first time he realized the glory of being a man and of being able to love and be loved by a glorious woman. For him the morning stars sang together and there was no thought of sin or shame in enjoying the blessing the gods had sent him.

Still further proof of the imperiousness of passionate love is afforded in the stories of ancient mythology where even the gods changed themselves into various forms in order to win the love and embrace the persons of lovely women. Jupiter assumed the form of a swan to enjoy the charms of Leda. Danae was placed in a cage to preserve her from his importunities, but he gained access to her by changing himself into a shower of gold. And to this day, shameful be the fact, many women succumb to a shower of gold who repel the advances of a poor but manly and honorable lover. Undoubtedly many of the cases reported of gods embracing women were founded on the fact that a woman who loves truly looks upon her lover almost as a devotee looks upon God, and when a supposed maiden was found to be with child she feared the disgrace which a pernicious education had attached to unwedded sex unions, and she declared a god had embraced her. In this way many so called immaculate conceptions may be accounted for. Even the Christian religion is founded on the teachings of a man whose father is said to have been God and his mother a woman. And yet the followers of Jesus are relentless in their persecution of unwedded mothers, although he was the Magdalen's friend.

No man has a higher reverence for woman than I have, but I also have so high a reverence for motherhood that it makes my blood boil with indignation when I hear the aspersions cast on an unwedded mother. The reproductive act is either right or wrong. If it is right no legislative or ecclesiastical act can make it wrong. If it is wrong no mumbling priest or magistrate can make it right. It is a matter which concerns only the two persons desiring to engage in its performance. When that desire is mutual it is Nature's doings, or if God is the author of Nature it is God's doing and "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder."

But women should be man's voluntary associate; not his slave. Her person should be at all times secure against invasion and no authority of any kind should give a man a right to be the invader of her person even under the name of husband. To a perfect man—perfect physically, mentally and psychically—there can be nothing more grand, more glorious, more upbuilding to all that is best in his nature, than the love of a worthy woman. Oh woman, thou art the inspirer of art, the soul of poetry, the sustenance of literature, the incarnation of love and the mother of humanity. Can angels be more? What ideal goddess can surpass the woman a man loves? In her he finds everything that is grand and noble and lovable and from her person comes an effluence which intoxicates his senses, making a hut a palace, a wilderness a Paradise. To him she is the jewel beyond compare, radiant with the light of hope and transcendent joy, the genius of peace, fitted for all that is best in all the realms of the universe. And yet this goddess, this paragon of all creatures, when she marries the man she loves—the man who has exhausted his vocabulary in bestowing words of praise on her and attempting to express the intensity and at the same time the tender solicitude of his love for her—when she marries this man she is expected to become the complacent instrument for the gratification of his sexual desires. What a terrible awakening from her heavenly dream of love!

Crudities Criticised—No. 8.

BY FRANCIS BARRY.

The criticism on B. C. Walker and "three or four others" for taking up too much room in Lucifer was legitimate. That is, it is perfectly in keeping with propriety for any and every patron to express an opinion as to how the paper should be conducted, provided the suggestions are condensed and plainly written, with no expectation that the editor will take the time and trouble to make any response. Suggestions are always in order if they are not crowded, or accompanied with any presumption that they are to be accepted. It is entirely natural that an editor should like to know how well he is meeting the views of his subscribers. Then he can shape his policy more or less, or not, as he pleases.

I do not agree with the critic referred to, however, so far as Walker is concerned. He has never written a line too much to please me. With supreme cheerfulness I will see my articles postponed at any time to make room for his. Not that I am in the least afflicted with excessive modesty; his articles are simply more important than mine as related to current events and doings. "I told you so," is not original with me, but I have been opposed to all the undertakings and changes involving expense, and in favor of concentrating all effort and money on the Lucifer weekly. Then if a goodly number who are earnestly desirous of its success could forego tea and coffee, beef-steak, butter and "biled shirts" and the third daily meal, Lucifer could be enlarged and E. C. Walker could be its corresponding editor, as he ought to be, and could write an article every week as he ought to do.

Not a single considerable writer for Lucifer probably, but is a favorite with at least a few. No one should be disturbed because some of the space is not, in his estimation, occupied to the best advantage. I am as fastidious as anybody ought to be, and I am not able to discount Lucifer's editor.

Elmina Drake Slenker has never written a line for Lucifer that I would have left out of a paper under my control, but I am constrained to make light of her effort in favor of the idea of woman's superiority. I was just getting ready to be disgusted at the idea of writing a long article in exposure of the crudity of the claim that woman is inferior. It was really a good article. I should have devoted a very short paragraph to the subject, and it would have been composed mainly of agatives.

I think the "Rev." Sydney Holmes has not been correctly labeled. "Rev." is a heathen title, and Holmes is no heathen. The Reverends are all hypocrites, and Holmes, as near as I can judge, is no hypocrite. The preachers all profess to adopt the Bible as their rule of faith and practice. The Bible enjoins the observance of the seventh day as a Sabbath, and says not a word in favor of observing the first day, but the priests pay not the slightest attention to the Bible injunction. The Bible says: "Thou shalt not kindle any fire in all thy habitations on the Sabbath day." But there is not a priest in the United States but will have his warm breakfast on the pretended Sabbath, and the "maid-servant" forbidden to do "any work" has to hustle and get it for him. The priests pretend to "follow Christ." He forbade public prayer. They utterly disregard his teaching.

Lucifer's regular readers all understand, of course, that Holmes is ridiculing hypocrisy and humbug. But is it dignified and proper to handle vile things even for the laudable purpose of exciting contempt and loathing for them? The transient reader will see rational and radical sentiments penned by a "Rev." They will naturally be affected, more or less, to associate the one with the other. So it amounts to a white-washing of the title, and so, a white-washing of religion—humanity's direst curse.

As to the taking up of Lucifer's space, I think the old friends, such as H. J. Hunt, Lillie D. White, and the like, should let us hear them at least semi-occasionally, and Chandler, Foote, Chamberlain, Severance, should say something a little oftener. Coolridge and Warren (favorites with me) write enough by spells. When C. F. Hunt devotes himself to religion he is charming. But let us all keep in happy assurance that they are with us to the end of the fight for freedom and woman's salvation.

Women's Clubs and Women's Faces.

BY FLORA.

The Chicago district of the Federation of Women's Clubs has begun a crusade on the practice of using pictures of women's faces and figures in magazines, newspapers and billboard advertisements. The legislature will be asked to enact a bill to the effect "that all publishers, public entertainers, manufacturers and tradesmen of any kind shall be forbidden to use the face, form, or any portion of the figure of women for advertising purposes in either suggestive or immodest or immoral manner."—Printer's Ink.

The Federation of Women's Clubs are terribly exercised over the pretty face fad of advertising. Is it possible that all the women in these clubs are so horribly "humbly" that none of them would be selected to pose and they want a law passed forbidding all others from "filling the bill?" Just think of it! "Shall be forbidden to use the face, form, or any portion of the figure of women for advertising purposes in immodest or immoral manner." The human form divine has been considered immodest by some very pious people, but this is a new fad to consider the pretty, beautifully featured faces of women "immodest and immoral" when viewed in an advertisement.

These women wield a terribly crooked stick over the heads of the legislature. In fact the Club—stick—is so crooked it can not possibly hit any one. 'Tis strange that women will waste valuable time and strength to sustain blind old superstition.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mrs. C. Zimmerman, Vineland, N. J.—Lucifer of the 18th has just arrived. It is the most satisfactory paper I read. It shows there is progress in most essential lines. I think it must be well for your father's health that he is in a mild climate in the midst of the whispering pines, though I did believe at first that he should be settled in a quiet hygienic home where the food would always be the purest and he would have no acquaintances to draw on his attention, and where he might drop the subject of his work for a time and take a complete rest.

Ida C. Craddock, 615-616 Handel Hall, Chicago.—I wonder if you care to announce in your forthcoming issue that I expect to lecture at the People's Institute, Van Buren and Leavett Sts. next Sunday evening, March 5, at 8 p. m., on "What the Bible Can Tell Us About Life in Heaven"?

As I deal with the subject as though Heaven were simply another country—say England, France, Russia, or the South Sea Islands—a country quite as material, substantial, tangible, objective as this, only a good deal more so, and especially as I claim that the Bible testifies to the existence of wedlock and the possibility of parenthood in Heaven, although it also testifies to the doing away with the civil, legal marriage of earth, it may be of interest to some of your readers to know that I expect to deliver this lecture. It will be given under the auspices of Mr. M. L. Schæffer and from his rostrum.

I am also holding Sunday noon meetings at my office at the hour of 12:15. Next Sunday morning I expect to begin a series of talks on "Bible Symbolism." I shall begin next Sunday with Sun and Dawn Myths," and run through several Sundays with this, I expect; and afterwards, shall expect to take up the "Zodiacal Mythos." To freethinkers, who recognize the abundance of Pagan mythology in both the Old and the New Testament, it might be of interest to know that I am to deliver these lectures, as I have made a very special research into these matters, both in this country and in London, where I studied at the British Museum, and I think I shall throw some new light upon certain scripture texts for even well-read freethinkers. "Sun and Dawn Myths" covers a wide field, and I take them up outside as well as inside the Bible, in order that my hearers may better understand their full bearing upon Bible Symbolism. I would add, for your information, that these lectures are free. And I always am glad to answer any questions at the close of my lecture that I can.

T. R. L., California.—I have from time to time read your paper and have found so many good things in it that I am going to send for it for three months. I just send $1 in stamps because I am very busy now, and after a while I will send you some money and some addresses of my friends. I have sent to editor of "Free Society" for "Hilda's Home," and other books. Will you send me a list of the books you have for sale, then I can pick out what I have not already sent for.

Oh, how I wish I could see you and all the broad-minded people that I read about in Lucifer and "Free Society." I know of so few people that are free. Will your father visit Los Angeles while on his trip? If he does I will do all I can to make him comfortable. I do so hope he will come here, I want to see him so much. You will never know how much comfort I have gotten out of the different articles I have found in your paper. I supposed I was all alone in my ideas of sex freedom; had never met one woman that thought as I did until I met Emma Goldman. That was almost a year ago, and I have had this love for freedom for more than twenty years. . .

I read "The Old and the New Ideal." I just read it through and thought it was the only book I ever read that came up to my ideal of life so far as it went. Well, some one took it from my room. I have just sent for another, but don't know if I will get it or not. Do you find time from the rest of your grand work to go among the poor girls who have been told they are disgraced for life because they have given birth to a child without being married? Now I tell you that I want a child, and if I could find a man that I considerered worthy of my choosing for the grand position of fatherhood, I would not hesitate one moment to become a mother, for, oh, I do love little ones, and my heart goes out to all. I long to have one of my own. I have been married twice; am a widow now, but of my four little ones I have none, as they passed out of this life in their babyhood, the oldest being only two years old. It is the only great sorrow of my life—being childless has cost me many tears. Of course I can adopt a child and I intend to by and by, but I want one of my own, and no one will ever know how much, nor how many heartaches I have because I have no child. . .

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the lancet deep into the ulcerous sores of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1.50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN

IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Medical Ethics as Related to Abortion and Prevention

BY E. C. WALKER.

The text is a very long one; the sermon is relatively short, but, I hope, sufficiently clear and explicit to bring out in sharp relief the fact which I wish all to perceive, that is, that sexual superstition and the state are responsible for a large part, for much the greater part, of the physical pain and waste and the mental agony caused by abortion and infanticide. The whole subject illustrates in actual life the proverb which inculcates the lesson that an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure.

Only a few introductory remarks and some explanatory and critical comments, made as the subject develops, are mine.

The question, medical ethics as related to abortion, has a direct and important connection with the liberating and enlightening work in which we are engaged.

Just a word at first about this work and the spirit in which it is to be approached. The suffering which results from the current denial of liberty in sex relations and by the dense ignorance which is at once a cause, an accompaniment, and an effect of this denial of liberty, is almost immeasurable if not inconceivable, in volume and intensity.

We are few in numbers, weak in organization, poor in resources, widely scattered and, in general, unknown to each other. In solid array against us are the closely combined forces of religion, politics, vested interests, conventionality, and, in short, all that constitutes the conservatism which inevitably and constantly tends to become reaction. Leaders in church, state, society, and business can have no patience with us, as with no others whose aspirations and efforts may disturb the status quo, may unsettle the existing order. But worse than all else, we have to contend the against apathy, the inertia of the masses.

Every earnest man and woman of us realizes the gravity of the issue, the momentous nature of the conflict. The struggle is no child's play, nor is there a place in it for the cap and bells of the clown. We are not engaged in this educative work because we think sexuality is wicked and therefore fascinating, but because we know that sexuality is as natural, normal, and innocent as any other function or department of our being and therefore is to be approached as the man of science approaches every other subject which he wishes to study, with the open mind, with serious intent, with wise method, with respect for himself and for man and woman. It is not for us to come to this investigation with the leer and smirk of the stable boy upon our lips and the taint of the prostitute in our minds, for that would imply that we believe, as they have been taught to believe, that while the sexual impulses and organs are provocative of delicious intoxication, they are at the same time "vile," "nasty" and "low." We utterly repudiate that old theological concept.

Whether we shall employ circumlocutions or speak in the direct, terse, and expressive manner of our ancestors is wholly a matter of expediency. For myself, when with those who are very dear to me or with others who prefer to use words that most effectively express their thoughts, without thinking them desirable simply because forbidden, I utilize the rugged and highly expressive phraseology of the past, for it seems to bring me into closer, more confidential, more tender association with these others who with me sincerely seek the truth and admire the natural. But I am instantly and violently repelled from whoever, when using these words or in other ways speaking of sex and its manifestations, shows that he feels he is doing something that is "naughty," or that calls for smile or sneer. By so comporting himself he reveals a mind still dominated by the ascetic notion that sex is indecent, that sexual love is a "sweet sin."

Do not imagine that these remarks are not germane to the subject as announced. Their intimate relation therewith will soon appear. It is my conviction that the prevailing, that is, the common, the unofficial, frivolous treatment of sexuality is wholly incompatible with the propaganda of liberty, with the scientific study of the causes of the evils we are striving to lessen or destroy. Take this question of abortion, for example:

We all understand that the number of abortions would drop off probably ninety per cent. were the people universally familiar with the best methods for the prevention of conception. It is clear, therefore, that this knowledge should be disseminated as rapidly as possible. Yet we know that the state and federal laws make it a felony to impart this vitally necessary information. And back of the law is the dominant public opinion. The average jury will much more quickly convict a man who is proved to have given a woman the means whereby she can avoid pregnancy than it will the man guilty of any real crime. Professional abortionists ply their trade with comparatively little risk, but where is there the humanitarian in the United States who dares openly advertise a contraceptic? If he did, how long would he remain out of the clutches of Comstock? The Censor and his supporters claim that they are fighting obscenity, still it is perfectly safe to say that ninety-nine out of every hundred of them, including the prosecuting attorneys who pursue earnest sociologists, the judges who rule and charge for the state, and the jurymen who convict, believe that sex is impure but never hesitate to get all the "fun" they can out of the equivocal story, and freely use the contraband words whenever not on dress parade as the protectors of purity. Is it not perfectly plain that this debauched condition of mind, this inverted view of sexology, is responsible for every obscenity law that stands in the pathway of the student, for the existence of the Draconian statutes regarding prevention of conception, and, finally and consequently, for the wholesale abortion which is constantly going on in the community?

It will be seen that this editorial article on "The Duty of the Physician in Cases of Criminal Abortion," which appeared in "The Medical Council" of Philadelphia, issue of December, 1897, gives us an opportunity to look at one phase of medical ethics from the viewpoints of the judge, the prosecuting attorney, and the doctor. We cannot fail to notice that there is a general desire on the part of these gentlemen to minimize if not entirely get rid of the penalties that the law provides for the discouragement of criminal abortion. Dr. Taylor, the editor, very happily calls attention to the prudent reticence of all the participants in the discussions, this "absence of perfect frankness," he says, being doubtless attributable to "the fear that by some unguarded slip one may be accused of having sentiments that are not conventional." But his own silence, when the silence of an observing and a thoughtful man would seem to be extremely difficult, is equally suspicious and suggestive.

Here is the article in full:

THE DUTY OF THE PHYSICIAN IN CASES OF CRIMINAL ABORTION.

On the evening of March 16, 1897, there was read before the Kings County Medical Society of Brooklyn, a paper with substantially the above heading, by Dr. Joseph H. Raymond, Professor of Physiology at the Long Island College Hospital in the same city. It was debated by a learned and upright judge, the Hon. Willard Bartlett of the Supreme Court, of New York, by the able District Attorney of the county, the Hon. Foster L. Backus, and by Drs. Alex. J. C. Skene and Charles Jewett, respectively Professors of Gynecology and Obstetrics in the same faculty with Dr. Raymond. We are thus explicit in the full identification of these gentlemen because of their exceptionally high standing in their respective callings as well as for their good judgment and honesty of purpose, and, furthermore, because of the many things they said, with some of which we agree, whilst we are forced to differ from them upon other points. We propose to present briefly an outline of the views expressed at this meeting and then submit our own conclusions, for the subject is one of vital import to the entire profession.

Dr. Raymond cited two cases, of which the Kitson-Playfair one was the first. The facts in the case are, that Mrs. Kitson was away from her husband for more than a year when she was seen by her brother-in-law, Dr. Playfair, as a consultant, having been called in by the patient's regular attendant. He found a dilated cervix, and removed what in his opinion was unquestionably recent placental tissue from an early miscarriage. On this account he advised his wife to have no further relations with Mrs. Kitson, and, to assure her compliance with this injunction, told her what he had found. As a consequence, the facts became generally known, and Mrs. Kitson had cut off a liberal allowance that she was receiving from a relative. She then sued for slander and consequent injury. For her benefit it must be added that there was a difference of opinion as to whether the placental tissue removed from her may not have been retained long enough to exculpate her from all blame. One professor of obstetrics testified in her favor, and her husband believed her innocent and defended her.

Dr. Playfair contended that he had a right to do as he had in the interest of his family. During the trial the judge asked the following question of one of the medical witnesses: "Suppose a medical man were called to attend a woman, and in the course of his medical attendance he discovers that she attempted to procure an abortion. That being a crime under the law, would it be his duty to go and tell the public prosecutor?" The reply was, "The last legal opinion upon that very question, obtained by the Royal College of Physicians, is 'Yes.'" "Then," said the judge, "all I can say is that it will make me very chary in the selection of my medical men."

The second case cited by Dr. Raymond occurred in the city of Brooklyn and is given anonymously because won by the defendant. A physician and midwife were accused of performing an abortion by the intra-uterine injection of warm water. At least the woman was so accused, whilst the physician was held liable as an accessory because he had not notified the authorities when called into the case. One of the leading surgeons of the city stated upon the stand that he would have notified the authorities, but that he readily saw that one with less experience would be liable to overlook this in the anxiety to save the patient. The jury rendered a verdict of acquittal.

From a painstaking view of the subject, the essayist concluded that the matter of professional confidences is in a chaotic state. But he makes no definite proposition as to what should be done, which is to be regretted, but leaves this to be disposed of by others in the discussion that had been arranged to follow the reading of his paper. The gist of the views thus expressed are substantially as follows:

Judge Bartlett declined on the ground of judicial impropriety to discuss the moral or unsettled legal aspects of the question, because he did not believe a judge should become party to any controversy in which he might at any time be required to act as judge between two contending sides. And in this he was unquestionably right. He confined himself to the law as it was now fixed. The law was not uniform in the states. In New York medical evidence was inadmissible without the consent of the patient. If the victim of criminal abortion died, it had been decided that the physician should be compelled to testify on the supposition that if she were able to speak she would waive the ban of professional secrecy. But in the case of a living woman, if she does not specially waive the privilege of secrecy granted under the law, the physician cannot be permitted to testify against her, on the ground that it would injure her reputation.

Mr. Backus, the District Attorney, read extracts from the law of New York that showed the complete protection given to lawyer and client by the law. A lawyer cannot reveal either what has been told him by a client or state what his advice has been. The law there prohibits a physician, without qualification as to criminal matters, to reveal anything that he may have discovered in his professional capacity, and that was necessary for him to know in the treatment of the patient. Mr. Backus suggested, however, that he might make incidental discoveries not due to admissions made by his patient, and that these could be disclosed indirectly, so that the criminal authorities might learn enough of the facts to institute an investigation. He further showed by quotations from judicial utterances that the object of the utterances was the full protection of the patient, who, without such guarantee of secrecy, would often withhold information absolutely essential to the proper treatment of the malady for which medical advice is sought. But the fact should not be overlooked that the aim of the law is to protect the patient, not the slayer of the victim, so that if the patient dies as the result of a criminal operation, disclosure can no longer injure her, though it protects the criminal. It is with this end in view that physicians are compelled to testify in New York after the death of the victim. He further maintained that it was desirable to bring to justice wrongdoers of this stamp, that this was in the best interest of the community, and that the physician should do his share toward this end.

Dr. Skene said: "I hold that the physician or surgeon has no right to disclose any fact or information that he obtains from his patients, under any conditions whatever. I believe that that is the only ground to take, and it is the only way that a physician can sustain himself in relation to his patients and to the law of the land, and to the moral law. The mistakes that are made and much of the suffering, misery and sin that follow, have arisen in this world, I fancy, from the doctors telling tales out of school, not from concealing and keeping inviolate all his professional confidences. That is the ground I take."

He opposed the doctor's ever playing the part of the detective in his professional capacity; he should never inform upon a patient. But if a patient under his care died from the effects of a suspected criminal abortion, he could refuse to give a death certificate, thus making it a coroner's case, and leading to full investigation of the details. If he treated a burglar for gunshot injury confessedly received in the attempt to rob, he would not notify the police, for he believed that an unjustifiable violation of confidence. He did not believe such violations justifiable even if permitted by lawyers and judges. He also made the point that the law is hard on the physician. It compels us to report contagious diseases to the board of health, though by so doing we are guilty of a violation of professional confidence, for most patients object to being so reported. He suggested that if contagious diseases had to be so reported, why not report the worst of them all, syphilis? It would cause much trouble, many people would be hurt, but as many, if not more, innocent people would be benefitted.

Dr. Jewett pointed out the fact that the life of a new individual begins at the moment of conception, that the old idea of the period of vitality dating from a given month is erroneous. Interference with the proper development of the product of conception at any period of its growth is a crime against morals. But he also takes the ground that professional confidence should not be abused to help prosecuting attorneys convict. However, he avers that "no malefactor is more despised by him than him whose business is to procure abortions unlawfully for gain. To voluntarily disclose the facts gleaned from a patient in a professional capacity, even to secure the conviction of a professiona abortionist, would be a gross breach of professional honor." He further added, "To not only make public the facts confided to him by his patient, but to assume the role of detective and hunt up further evidence, as I have known a physician to do, is, to my mind, the height of professional dishonor."

Thus ended a discussion alike remarkable for the ability and learning of the participants, its frankness, its pointedness, and the definiteness of most of its conclusions. But it exhibited inconsistencies that so intricate a subject may well occasion and which it was justifiable to hope would not occur among disputants of such high ability. Besides this, it was unsatisfactory in other particulars.

It is a surprise that no one attacked the position of the New York judge who decided that, were the dead victim of an abortion able to speak, she would open her physician's lips so that the person guilty of the abortion might be punished. This is a gratuitous assumption, and all the more evident when it is taken into consideration that when these things are done by persons who do not make a business of it, they do it out of sympathy rather than for pay. That the woman usually pleads that she would prefer death to exposure, and pledges herself under all circumstances, even if death be the outcome, not to reveal what has been done. She pleads and begs and gives extravagant assurances of future secrecy under all contingencies. She urges the family disgrace that will follow exposure, and that she has earned a lesson that she will never forget. We all know the tenor of this plea, and too often do we see how readily the most solemn pledges are broken, not only in the fear of impending death, but often only in response to the coaxing of some curious or meddling individual. One of the most truthful things that can be said of the physician guilty of such practice is that he is a sympathetic fool, though the law also justly makes him a criminal, and the moral code a malefactor. To assume, therefore, that, could the victim speak she would open the lips of her attendant is gratuitous, whilst the opposite assumption of adhesion to her solemn pledge is logical, reasonable and just, for the other presumes her to be an ingrate.

The suggestion of Mr. Backus, that the physician disclose to others so that they may carry it to the prosecuting officer such evidence as he may have been able to gather in a voluntary detective capacity, overlooks the great fact that it is the duty of the physician to protect his patient and not simply to pretend to do so. The proposition to play the spy upon the trusting patient is too vile to be seriously entertained, and from our personal knowledge of the gentleman who made this unguarded suggestion, we are satisfied that it was made without full consideration. We must all agree with him, however, that the criminal should not be protected, and yet we are constrained to add the proviso that the criminal must never be punished with the aid of the attending physician if by so doing he injure his patient in the slightest degree. There is greater reason for the protection of the physician in the preservation of the patient's secrets than there is for the lawyer in that of his client, and yet it is even seriously proposed that the major yield to the minor.

And Dr. Skene, than whom there is none of greater honor, even proposes to do that indirectly which he spurns to do directly. He would not notify the public prosecutor in so many words, directly that certain suspicious circumstances existed, but he would do so indirectly by compelling an ignorant or a heart-broken family to advertise their shame and that of a beloved and respected daughter to the world. This is not the protection that a confiding patient is entitled to. If we are not willing to do our full duty by the patient under all circumstances then let us at once refuse to take care of her, and let her find some one that will give her the protection that she needs and craves. Now, we do not wish to be understood as justifying abortions except on legal grounds, for we are distinctly opposed to any premature expulsion of the ovum by artificial methods except where it is necessary for the preservation of life as permitted by law. Many a woman could bear her shame alone, and would willingly do so, but she does not want to implicate relatives. This is often her sole plaint. Then why assume that the multi-pledged unfortunate, and yet perhaps fortunately dead, woman, if able to speak, would at last consent to the disgrace of the family that had filled her with so much solicitude? We can only conclude, with due regard to Dr. Skene, that the physician who will send such a case to the coroner is acting more within his logical conscience if he refuses to attend it the moment he learns its nature. We seriously and respectfully commend to him his own formula, so well put, as are so many of his utterances, that more harm results from what the physician tells than from what he keeps to himself. If he considers the notifying the police of his having treated a burglar for gunshot injury as an unjust violation of confidence, how can he consider the carrying out of his coroner suggestion in any other sense?

Dr. Jewett declared himself in his usual vigorous and explicit manner. He recognized no special difference in the degree of the crime according to the age of the fetus. From the standpoint that it is at all times a destruction of life, he is undoubtedly right, and yet there is a vast difference from the sociologic and the economic sides of the question. But this we only allude to incidentally, believing that in these speculative matters the doctor's assertions were not intended to have any application. His trenchant denunciation of the violation of professional confidence is refreshing, but he leaves one in utter uncertainty as to his own exact position under the circumstances covered by the discussion, for he concludes with the remark that it is the duty of all physicians to be at all times law-abiding citizens. He would better say conscience-abiding citizens, for there is a difference between the two, the amount depending upon the extent to which our law-makers have been debauched, and this is latterly becoming an absorbing as well as important question.

To sum up, then, as the lawyers have it, we fear that the discussion, able as it was, was open to the same objections that all discussions of its kind seem to have, the absence of perfect frankness because of the fear that by some unguarded slip one may be accused of having sentiments that are not conventional. There is nothing connected with medicine about which medical men are at the same time such cowards and hypocrites. Their public utterances often do not tally with their confidential expressions of opinion. The same is true to a large extent of the laity, and it is this duplicity that makes cowards of the profession.

In the Land of Flowers.

Florida was so named, if I rightly remember the story, on account of the abundance of wild flowers found there by its Spanish discoverer, Juan Ponce de Leon. There is probably no season of the year in which flowers do not bloom here in the open air. Since last writing the weather at Lake Helen camp has been balmy and mild, with the exception of one day of almost continuous rain. Old settlers tell me the winter just past has been the rainiest ever known. In this part of the state, however, there is never any mud. The sandy soil absorbs the water so quickly that all trace of rain speedily disappears.

My last letter closed abruptly while giving an account of a meeting at the auditorium of the camp, at which meeting the subject under discussion was "The Ascent of Life—How Evolution Evolves." The purpose of the address, as before stated was to show the paramount importance of surrounding motherhood with the best possible conditions in and through which woman's creative functions could and should be performed. Among those who made comments upon the address was C. Fanny Allyn of Stoneham, Mass., who made an eloquent and powerful plea for a more general and more rational education along the lines touched upon by the first speaker. Mr. Barnes of Kokomo, Ind., asked how I accounted for the fact that a pair of perfect human beings, Adam and Eve, so soon became the parents of a murderer. In my reply I said there was no such fact to be accounted for. That the evolution theory had supplanted or displaced the creation theory in accounting for the existence of the human race upon the earth. That is to say, the Adam and Eve story is one of many mythologic fables that owe their origin to the ignorance of primitive man in regard to the facts and forces of nature. That if there is any truth in the theory of an Utopia, or Paradise, for humanity, that Utopia is in the future and not in the past.

"Well then," said Mr. Barnes, "admitting that the 'Garden of Eden' story, the 'Creation' story, is a myth, what reason have we for believing that the 'evolution' theory and the Utopia promised by the believers in evoluion are not also myths?"

"This question," said I, "like the preceding one, indicates very clearly that the questioner is a good joker—that he is not really in earnest when offering such questions as criticisms. The difference between the 'creation' theory and that of 'evolution' is mainly in this, that while the former has not a single fact to stand upon, the latter is supported by facts without number. All the known facts of science harmonize with the evolution theory, and will harmonize with no other. And as to an Utopia for mankind in the future we have only to realize or to practicalize in human ethics, in human sociology, the advances made in other departments of human progress and the result will be a 'heaven on earth.' Wars, crimes, poverty and misery will be eliminated, or so nearly eliminated that, as compared to the social conditions now prevailing we shall not need to die in order to go to heaven. We can have heaven in 'the here and the now.'

"It is because some of us have an abiding faith in the possibility of such heaven on earth that we are so persistent in the work of agitating for better conditions for womanhood and motherhood as prime factors in creating a better race of human beings—a race of men and women so well born that they will not need to be born again; a race composed of individuals who know their own rights and dare to maintain them; a race every member of which can be a law unto himself or herself—neither invading others nor permitting invasion by others."

Several other meetings devoted mainly to discussion of the rights of womanhood and motherhood have been held on the ground, an account of which must be postponed for the present, as I wish to get this letter into the mail in time for insertion in next week's Lucifer.

At this writing, Saturday morning, March 4, the four weeks' session of the "Southern Cassadaga" encampment is nearing its close, to-morrow being the last day, according to published program. Taken altogether, my sojourn at the camp has been a very pleasant and, it is to be hoped, not altogether unprofitable one. While the general symptoms of the invalid remain much the same, I am conscious of a very decided increase in physical strength. I take long walks in the piney woods and return refreshed rather than fatigued thereby. How long I shall remain in Florida, or whether my search for health shall be extended still further southward is not yet fully determined, but my present intention is to start on my return trip before many days, touching at most if not all the points at which I made brief stops on my way to this place. Hoping that with the return of spring our friends who felt the effects of the recent phenomenal cold wave will forget what they suffered therefrom, I once more send fraternal greetings to all of the widely scattered Light Bearer family.

M HARMAN.

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

The article on "Medical Ethics as Related to Abortion and Prevention," by E. C. Walker, was written more than a year ago, and was read at a meeting of a Lucifer Circle. The time that it was written, however, is not of much consequence, for the subject matter is just as important today as ever it was.

Last week we were told by Mr. Barry that each writer for Lucifer is a favorite with some of the readers. That is true; but there is scarcely a writer who is not the "pet aversion" of certain readers. I had this fact forcibly brought to my mind last week while assorting and re-arranging manuscripts and papers preparatory to our change. I wish I had thought of it in time to keep the letters containing comments on correspondence together—the expressions of opinion would have made an interesting symposium. If one writer could have his way, nothing of C. L. James' should ever appear in the paper; another critic is equally severe in condemnation of Warren and Barry; another wonders "what on earth Kerr is driving at, anyway;" another is "made sick" by Mrs. Slenker (query: Is the doctor bill to be sent to Lucifer office?) Others appear to think that the editor is a mere puppet in the hands of Mr. Walker, because Mr. Walker occupies so much of Lucifer's space. I come in for my share. Lucifer, says one critic, has improved in typography since I have been connected with it, but there is "no life" in it when I edit it. Still others think the editor himself should resign in favor of some one with greater ability than he possesses. It would, however, be very difficult to find any writer for Lucifer who would be acceptable to all these critics. The only ones to escape condemnation who occur to me at this moment, are Giotto and D. N. Swift. Some of the conjectures as to their identity are quite amusing though. Possibly our dissatisfied friends might "toss up" to decide which of these writers they would choose as editor.

"Who is to Blame?" we are asked in a pathetic little sketch which appears in another column. Ah, who, indeed, is to blame when people do not understand each other—when there is not whether they are related by blood or not? This poor, misunderstood, unloved little one—was she to blame? Did she ask admission to this life? This apparently unsympathetic mother, who seemed to prefer fancy work to the companionship of her child—was she to blame? She tried to take good care of its body, but was she to blame because she could not understand the emotions of that being which was really a stranger to her? Perhaps the embroidery which she was making was to beautify the garments of a little one yet unborn. Wherein was she to blame? This healthy, busy, affectionate father—was he to blame? Had he been taught that men and women should understand each other, and should both desire children before they undertook the responsibility of creating a new organism? Shall we blame the innocent, unhappy child, the ignorant, impatient mother, or the careless, loving father? If so, why? Do they not suffer the results of the ignorance, the superstitions, of our ancestors?—from which none of us are entirely free. It seems to me a case like thousands of others, of inadaptation. Our work, I think, is to ask, not angrily, not impatiently, but persistently, Why such cases exist? What can we do to lessen their number? No one is to blame, but all are to blame in so far as we accept the conditions of society and do not try to improve them.

In the Field.

BY M. FLORENCE JOHNSON.

My trip in Ohio during the past month, lecturing and giving entertainments, has been a very enjoyable time for me. I will not take your space to tell you all about it, but only what I heard and observed in relation to that part of life in which Lucifer is engaged.

On Jan. 29 I spoke at the Paine celebration for the Ohio Liberal Society of Cincinnati. At that meeting cards were distributed announcing the lectures for February.

The first thing on the program was "February 5—Mrs. M. Florence Johnson. Address on Rachel Campbell, a pioneer of the doctrine of social freedom, with a review of her lecture on 'The Prodigal Daughter, or the Price of Virtue,' delivered before the Boston Free Love League, 1881." Before the meeting of Jan. 29 was called to order there was considerable conversation started by this notice and some curiosity aroused. All that week reports came to me of what this one and that one intended to say in criticism. The effect of the speech however, was to show these would-be critics that the remarks they had so carefully prepared did not fit the case, and I believe that only one criticism that I had heard about was given. The audience gave their undivided attention to the address, and at its close the questions and criticisms were all bearing directly on the question under discussion, and the meeting passed off very pleasantly.

We always expect some little inconsistency and we were not disappointed. There is one man in the Liberal Society who is sure we cannot get along without rules and regulations and laws. One of the rules of the Society is that individuals may criticise the speech of the evening, and the speaker shall reply. This man criticises well, but while the speaker is replying, the critic makes a remark every few seconds, and is wholly unaware of the fact that he is not obeying the laws, that he is acting the popular conception of the revolutionary anarchist for the time being.

There was no woman among all those who claimed that Rachel Campbell's ideas of marriage and prostitution were wrong. Men declared that women had freedom enough, and that no woman was driven to prostitution through necessity. The women said not a word. Several of them came to me after the meeting adjourned and expressed their sympathy with the views given in the address, also complimented me on my bravery in daring to read such a lecture. All seemed interested, some filled with fear of losing their property if such ideas were listened to, some with hope of freedom after awhile.

The "Inquirer" said the lecture was visionary and the speaker easily undone by her critics, or words to that effect. As I am not the author of the lecture, I think I may venture an opinion that the ideas in "The Prodigal Daughter" are not visionary, and as the one criticised I may remark, I did not feel undone, and had no thought of being worsted until I read it in the "Inquirer."

From Cincinnati I went to Mechanicsburg. There I attended several sessions of The Farmer's Institute. Even there the idea that woman had not been treated as an equal with man received frequent attention. One farmer quoted statistics showing the predominance of farmers' wives in the insane asylums of the country. He attributed the cause of insanity to overwork, no recreation and no appreciation, and advised farmers to give their wives more of the comforts and attentions received by the wives of other men.

This is a step in the right direction, but I felt like saying after it, "If you do not see to this your property will depreciate in value or you may lose her through insanity, and this would be expensive, for you could not marry again while she lived and would be under the necessity of hiring work done."

Another speaker advocated deeding half the property to the wife. He maintained that wives as a rule worked harder than the husbands, and the property belonged to them by right, and as the law did not give it the husband should. Many women looked pleased, but not a smile touched the faces of the men sitting there, and when I applauded it sounded as loud and lonesome as a noise does in a house when you are half sick and alone. People turned and looked at me and I suppose wondered at my audacity.

The speaker said in many cases "instead of a wife having her half of the money to spend as she pleased she had to beg for a nickel to buy a spool of cotton to mend her husband's overalls." Some women really applauded.

This speaker gave advice on all subjects, and advised parents to attend church and send children to Sunday school whether they believed the creed or liked the minister or not, because "we must uphold morality."

It did not seem to enter his head that there was what might be termed immorality in supporting a church we thought in the wrong, or that children could take their first lesson in hypocrisy by pretending to accept in Sunday school the lessons they did not believe.

There are women's clubs among the farmer's wives and they are doing much good. Some of their programs are very fine, and the papers written by the members are worthy of any club of either sex. Strange that farmers' wives did not assert their intellectual power long ago. Yet even now, some of the husbands of these literary club women will say slurring and insulting things as the women drive by on their way to their meeting place.

One woman said to me, "No one has any rights except what have been fought for, and we will get ours by fighting for them and in no other way."

I find women all over the country interested in reforming marriage laws, interested in very radical ideas in fact—unless these ideas are named free love.

One woman agreed that a desire to separate on the part of either man or woman ought to be sufficient ground for divorce. She had thought that a long while. She also agreed with me in the opinion that law made nothing right or wrong, that all abuses had been legal, and if anything was right in itself the law could not change it. But when I spoke of persons living together without a legal ceremony she feared that would not do because "one might take a notion to go away and leave the other." I told her I thought that was what she believed when she said either ought to have a divorce for the asking. No ceremony simply saved the scandal of a public divorce.

One man objected to radicals on the social question because they made it too much of a hobby, and wanted to talk about it all the time, then admitted that though he had known me for nearly three years he had supposed me conservative until he saw the announcement of the address on Rachel Campbell and "The Prodigal Daughter."

I found that many persons thought my radical views were merely a transient notion that had infatuated me through acquaintance with Lillian Harman. I had made her acquaintance and seeing her honest in her views and admiring her as a woman had given undue prominence to her ideas, and I would see my mistake later when I learned the impracticability of such living. I was told there were very few persons who held sexual freedom views. Lucifer was supposed to be the only paper advocating sexual freedom and it a paper with at most three or four hundred subscribers.

To these remarks I replied that I was working as compositor on a paper advocating sexual emancipation, before Lillian Harman was seven years old. So to all those who think my views wrong, Lillian is cleared of all responsibility in introducing me to this kind of thought, though undoubtedly my views have been broadened by acquaintance with her.

As to the alleged small number of believers, I informed them that in several cities there were enough believers in freedom to have regular meetings, hold picnics, have social gatherings, and in fact not miss the enjoyment of social life even if deprived of other society. As radicals are not deprived of conventional society they have the meetings of their special interest extra. I also informed them that Lucifer's subscribers could not be written in the hundreds, as they had supposed, but in the thousands, while the book business in the office was such that it took much time to attend to it. That just the managing of Lucifer and its book business required the constant attention of one competent person.

Nearly all liberals are interested in the social question; all want to hear and talk but many are afraid. In one town where I gave an entertainment of dramatic readings, the ladies who engaged me would gladly have me give certain humorous recitations, but feared others would object because the entertainment was to be in a church. Finally they chose one they thought all could stand, but the minister scratched that one off the program. He "liked it himself, but some of the congregation might object."

Besides the places mentioned above, I visited Sidney and Lima, where I enjoyed myself well, and among the genuine friends I met at these places were staunch friends of Lucifer. My dramatic and freethought work was as interesting as this recorded here, but Lucifer's pages are not the place for an account of that.

I believe the world is growing more in love with liberty every day, and men and women admire more and more persons who are free, and who dare trust themselves for their own law maker. They are learning that the person who is a law to himself knows the laws he lives under, and has confidence in his lawyer and the laws are obeyed. Such a person is not an invader, but a self-reliant individual with the intelligence, knowledge and ability to be a helper in all the struggles of life, and a comrade in its joys.

Medical Ethics as Related to Abortion and Prevention.

(Concluded from page 75).

Our own opinion, tersely expressed, is that it is the duty of the medical attendant to never forget his confidential relations to the patient. If intrusted with a secret by a patient who dies, his obligation to maintain secrecy is, if at all changed, more binding than ever. The professional abortionist is justly made a criminal, for he plies his occupation solely for what it will bring, and encourages a condition of affairs that are baneful. If knowledge of this individual comes to the physician, he can, after a time, acquaint anyone he chooses with his opinion of what such an individual is doing, but in such a manner as will in no way tend to involve his patient, and yet will give the clue to those whose business it is to stop his farther work. But under no circumstances should he involve his patient, or her memory as the case may be, in any way that would not have met her approval at the time she engaged him to help her, or at any time during his attendance upon her.

Of course I do not lose sight of the fact that the topic was the relation of the physician to his patients in cases of abortion, and of the further fact that it is very commendable to stick to the text, but inasmuch as not a little was said about the criminality of abortion and its immorality, and as it is indisputable that all the laws and all the moral homilies in the world will not prevent resort to the abortionist while conditions remain as they are, it certainly would have been well to point out that the physician might do much to change conditions for the better and so make his position a less delicate and dangerous one, and that he could accomplish this by taking a far more active part than he does now in the physiological education of the people, and especially in showing the necessity for the universal use of contraceptics in order to substitute harmless prevention for injurious cure. But in all the debate there was not even a hint that there is any possible check upon abortion except penal law—which the doctors pretty generally agree it is their duty to conspire with their patients to balk—and moral sermonizing, which is so much waste of breath.

In a word, religious superstition and moral prudery, and the repressive laws which are their authoritative expression, are all that stand in the way of scientific study of sex problems, and the social readjustments which would follow such rational investigation. Abortion is one of the positive checks which human stupidity forces upon us by denying knowledge of the preventive check.

Who is to Blame?

"C. M. A." in "The Coming Light."

The child sat looking wearily out of the window counting the ducks and goslings that were splashing around in the pools of water which the heavy rainfall had formed in the yard where the children were wont to play. The little one sighed deeply, and laying the tiny hands over her heart, repeated sometimes to herself, sometimes aloud, "O, I ache me so inside."

The mother looked up from her work and said sharply, "You are the strangest child I ever saw. Other children play with their toys on rainy days and are satisfied. I can't imagine what ails you." The little one gave a frightened glance in the direction of her mother, closed the red lips more tightly, and began counting the ducks again.

Presently she climbed down from the chair and ran across the room to where the mother sat embroidering some dainty material in soft silken shades. "Pretty," said the child.

"Don't touch it; you'll soil it; your hands are dirty," said the mother.

"Mamma, won't you take Mabel a wee little while?" the child plead, measuring her finger just back of the nail to show how wee little she asked.

"Do go and play," carelessly said the mother, "I haven't time."

The child stood quite still a moment, then said, "Mamma, let Mabel brush hair?" The mother worked on without looking up.

"Mamma, when will papa come? I ache me so inside!"

"Mabel, this is Monday; your papa went away last night; he will not return until Saturday night. Don't ask me any more questions."

The child moved slowly back to the window, knelt down and laid her head in the chair. A sweet picture she was, with her snowy dress and blue sash ribbon, eyes to match the ribbon and yellow fluffy hair, her cheeks flushing and paling by turns as her busy brain kept thinking, thinking, with no one on earth to talk to.

By and by she scrambled up again and went back to the mother. She climbed on the arm of the rocker and put her hand against the mother's face saying, "Mamma, I loves you, I want a kiss."

"I don't want to be kissed," returned the mother, "and you must quit bothering me. Get down from my chair."

The tiny mouth trembled, but bravely keeping back the tears the child picked up her doll and covered its senseless face with hungry, loving kisses, saying, "Dollie, do you ache inside?"

"Mabel, what do you mean by such nonsense? It is time for your afternoon nap. Climb into the crib now and go to sleep."

Hugging the doll to her bosom, the child pushed a chair to the crib and climbed in. After an hour or more of forced silence, the effect of training, she lay heavily sleeping.

It was Saturday night at last. The fire blazed brightly, illuminating the face of the restless baby, who watched the hands of the clock as they slowly moved from half past six toward the seven o'clock hour, at which time papa should arrive.

"Mamma, can I go to the door?" pleaded the child.

"Sit right where you are and wait until papa comes," replied the mother. "What makes you so uneasy?" The child sighed and said nothing.

Five minutes of seven—only that long measured the little fingers. Presently the well-known footsteps sounded on the walk. The child flew to the door, breathlessly waiting the touch of the father's hand upon the door knob. A moment later and she was caught in the strong arms and covered with kisses.

"How is my little girl?" said the father.

"The ache is gone now," answered the child.

"How is mamma?"

"She is making pretty pictures on cloth," said the baby.

"Hello, here is mamma!" and the manly form bent and kissed his wife's forehead. "Has Mabel been ill?" he asked.

"No," said the wife, "she just mopes around and don't play as other children do. She is the strangest child I ever saw."

The child stepped shyly behind the father, clinging closely to his hand.

Supper is over. The child robed for the night, is standing upon her father's lap mussing his hair with a brush, stopping to kiss his lips and eyes while screaming with delight as he returns the kisses a dozen fold.

"How can you bear to have that child walk over you, pull your hair and kiss you in the mouth? I should think her hot hands and breath would drive you crazy," said the mother.

"O, we like it, don't we, tot?" and he pulled her down on his foot to "ride away to Boston;" then lifted her again and folded her to his breast.

Wearying at last, the child fell asleep with her arms around his neck, a look of rest and peace indescribable wreathing the sweet flushed face. The father tenderly laid her in the crib and tucked the clothes about her, gazing long and affectionately upon her, then quietly kissed the sleeper, picked up his paper and began to read while his helpmeet continued to stitch in silence. One more day of kisses and love for the hungry baby, then six of the "ache inside."

Mother, is this your child? If so, what shall the harvest be?

Homes of the Future.

BY ROMULUS.

It is growing harder year by year for men to get a living for themselves, to say nothing of wife and children. Women are competing with men in every employment, and men's wages are consequently lowering; in other words, part of the wages which men have required to enable them to support wife and children are being transferred to the account of the unmarried women.

It is not strange that men show less inclination to marry than formerly, and that they marry later in life. In fact, the married man is fighting for his wages not only against women but against an ever-increasing army of men without encumbrances, and to whom a lower wage rate does not necessarily mean disaster. The tendency is toward this—that sometime, only the wealthy few may marry. Thus the present competitive and marriage systems mean the destruction of the home for all but a small portion. There must be a new foundation for the home—the economic independence of the individual. But that and liberty to love, and new and happy homes will be built everywhere like nests of free birds in spring.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mrs. F. A. M. Cook, M. D., Columbus, Kan.—I have been waiting for a chance to renew before No. 756, and now I have a present of the enclosed and I send $1 on subscription and $1 for "Hilda's Home." I have been amused at the squirming of some of my sister women because of male "monopoly" of Lucifer's columns. It is not the person who writes as much as it is the matter and manner of the contribution that is important with me.

Miss L. A. Johnson, Waterbury, Conn.—I could not keep from weeping as I read the sketch you gave of your father's life. He must be a noble specimen of a man and one among a thousand it seems to me. There are many reforms in the world, and I would like to be able to help them all, but lack the means. I wanted to give something towards your father's visit in the south but it seemed so small I thought it would be of little account; yet if each subscriber should give a little, fifty cents or a dollar it would amount up to an important sum. I suppose my subscription has expired, so will send one dollar in this—fifty cents for six months' subscription to Lucifer and fifty cents for your father's benefit.

Alfreda, Thayer, Miss.—Our editress says in No. 749, "Elmina Mounts Her Hobby Again." And why not? If we really are the superior animal and can prove the same on scientific principles, we must assert and re-assert our claims—be ever ready to explain them, and it is well to give our friends the benefit of calling their attention to some of the good books we have read, and to give our own thoughts on the subject as does our dear Aunt Elmina. It is wonderful how devoted she is to her self-imposed task in trying to get liberal men and women acquainted through correspondence. While there is always some risk to run in corresponding with entire strangers, even though they are in the liberal ranks, it will help us to gain a knowledge of mankind in general, and enable us better to discern the false from the true.

[Our friend is mistaken in assuming that I slighted Mrs. Slenker by placing an offensive title over her article. "Elmina Mounts Her Hobby Again" was the title she wrote at the head of her article, and I allowed it to go in the paper in those words as I presumed she knew what she wanted—"Only this, and nothing more." L. H.]

Harriet R., Rusk, Okla.—Ostensibly, C. L. James and I disagree, but I confess to being unable to locate the exact point at which his "break" occurs. I have not the ability to engage with him in a parry and thrust of words that would prove as interesting and instructive as the fencing match which has been going on between him and R. B. Kerr. But I think the gist of the matter is this: Mr. James is an anarchist, i. e., he believes that government itself is the cause of the social evils, though he concedes that some forms of government must be retained for the sake of convenience. I am a socialist, and I concede that ideal anarchy will come in the order of evolution, but necessarily after socialism has paved the way. I wrote the letter in defense of that socialistic institution, the public school.

In my critic's estimate of so-called education I find nothing new or startling, having frequently heard the same phase of the question discussed in a similar manner among educators, members of "a class posressing peculier aptitudes derived from practice." There is food for thought in his advice for the use o the responsible parent before said parent shall say, "My son, ...go to the schoolmaster now." But as Mr. James did not put into the balance the irresponsible parent, and advanced no proof of the inefficacy of all governmental measures, I am not convinced that the public school is not a potent factor in the betterment of existing conditions of society.

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 435 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the lancet deep into the ulcerous sores of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1 50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN

IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 286 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 80 cents; cloth, $1

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 122 pages. Price 25 cents.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

Contains matter pertaining to the Legitimation League and the Personal Rights Association of England. Also, four fine full page portraits of Ezra H. Heywood, Moses Harman, Lillian Harman and Lois Waisbrooker, together with sketches of their personalities and work. By Oswald Dawson. Neatly bound in boards. Price, 35 cents. Address Moses Harman, 1294 Congress st., Chicago.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 50 cts in per dozen.

Personal. A radical gentleman residing in Washington, D. C., a chiropodist by profession, desires the acquaintance of a radical lady, also chiropodist. Object being to form a compact for business and social purposes. Excellent opening for the right party. Address Chiropody, cr. Lucifer.

Wanted A publisher for "Little Freethinker"—a liberal atheist. Also names of liberals who want correspondents. The applicants for correspondents will send four cents in stamps. Address Elmina Drake Slenker, Snowville Pub. Co., Va.

Wanted: To let, Room to a radical who desires to have a home with a radical family. Address L. M., care of Lucifer.

Wanted. A neat and tidy woman to keep house for gentleman in the country. Middle-aged lady prefered. Address J. C., care of Lucifer.

Wanted: Correspondents. Liberal ladies with good intentions. Am 35 years of age, unmarried, and own a good farm in the West. Address J. M., care of Lucifer.

Heredity.

We pride ourselves, in weighing worth and merit,
Too much on virtues that we inherit.
Some puritanical grandsire makes us hate delay,
And we are proud to keep our oath and day;
But our ancestral follies and abuses
We still indulge and make for them excuses.
Let him be proud—dared man be proud at all—
Who stands where all his fathers used to fall,
Holding their virtues fast and passing on,
Still higher good through his own victories won.

THE HUMAN BEING.

(Letter written to P. J. Proudhon by Joseph Dejacque in 1857. Translated from Les Temps Nouveaux by Jonathan Mayo Crane).

In the depths of Louisiana, whither I have been driven by the vicissitudes of my exile, I have read in a United States paper, "La Revue de'l Duest," a fragment of correspondence between you, P. J. Proudhon, and a Madam Hericourt.

Some words of Madam Hericourt, cited in that paper, cause me to fear the feminine antagonist may not have the strength—polemically speaking—to cope with her brutal masculine adversary.

I know nothing of Madam Hericourt nor of her writings, if she is a writer, nor of her position in the world, nor of her personality. But to argue well concerning women, or to argue well concerning men, earnestness is not all that is necessary. One must have seen much and studied much. One must, I believe, have experienced their personal passions in all stations of society, from the silver-tipped summits where vice is happiness to the depths where misery seeks solace in debauchery. Upon the human rock thus battered by the shocks of life, the logic, the stenciled truth, may be read.

I should like to see the question of the emancipation of woman treated by a woman who has loved much and has loved many, and who in her past life has associated with both the aristocratic and the lowly; for the woman of the garret can pentrate and understand the private or official views and the thoughts of the luxurious grand dame more easily than the woman of the salon can comprehend the open or hidden privations of the daughter of poverty.

However, in default of another Magdalen, bathing the feet of crucified humanity with her fecund tears and striving to lift it to a better world, for lack of this voice of civilized repentance, for lack of this woman who proudly and publicly abjuring all prejudices of sex and race, of laws and customs, will bring us back to the former world, I, a human being of the male sex, will endeavor to answer you, Aliboron-Proudhon. For the emancipation of woman is nothing else than the emancipation of humanity—both sexes.

Is it possible, great publicist, that under your lion's skin so much of the ass may be found? You who have in your veins such powerful revolutionary pulsations for all that pertains to labor with the arms or filling the stomach, your transports are no less fiery, but are stupid and reactionary, when you come to consider the emotions of the heart and of the sentiments. Your nervous and unending logic in questions of industrial production and consumption is without force when you consider questions of moral production and consumption. Your intelligence, virile for all that concerns man, seems emasculated when it is a question concerning woman. With hermaphrodite brain your thoughts recoil upon themselves in powerless efforts to conceive and give birth to social truth.

A masculine Joan of Arc who, it is said, has kept himself chaste for forty years, the maceration of love has ulcerated your heart, the rancor of jealousy has filled you with disgust and you cry "War against women!" as the Maid of Orleans cried "War against the English!" The English burnt her alive. The women have made you a husband, oh, holy man, long time a virgin and always a martyr.

Father Proudhon, shall I say it? When you talk of women you appear like a college boy who talks very loudly and in a high key, at random and with impertinence, in order to appear learned, as you do to your callow hearers, and who like you knows not the first thing of the mattter he is talking about.

After having profaned your flesh for forty years you now profane your intelligence, and passing from pollution to pollution you pour forth your impurities to besmirch women.

Is that what you call manly and honest civility, Narcissus-Proudhon? I quote your words:

"No, Madam, you know nothing about your sex; you know not the first thing about the questions you and your honorable associates agitate with so much noise and so little success. And if you do not understand this question, if in the eight pages of the response which you have made to my letter there are forty illogical conclusions, that shows the truth of what I have said of the infirmity of your sex. I mean by these words—the exactness of which may not be irreproachable—the quality of your understanding which will not permit you to seize the significance of things which women have at our fingers' ends. In your skull, as in your abdomen, is a certain organ which is incapable of conquering its own inertia; which requires the male to make it perform its functions. And even then it is not always successful. Such madam, is my opinion, the result of my direct and positive observations. I leave it to your obstetrical sagacity to calculate from it for your thesis the incalculable consequences."

You wild boar—which is merely an undomesticated hog—if it is true, as you say, that woman can give birth to nothing from either the brain or the abdomen without man's assistance—and it is true—it is equally true the other way; it is reciprocal; neither can man produce from his flesh or his brain without woman's assistance. That is logic and good logic, Madelon Proudhon, that an apprentice who has always been your obedient servant can snatch from your hands and throw in your face.

Emancipation or non-emancipation of woman, emancipation or non-emancipation of man—what does it mean? Is it that by nature one has rights and the other has no rights? Is it that humanity is singular and not plural, masculine and not feminine? Is it that the difference in the sexes is a difference in the nature of humanity. Are the drops of rain which fall from the clouds not the same whether they are few or many, whether they are large or small?

Place the question of the emancipation of woman in line with the emancipation of the serf—woman as well as man; or to say the same thing differently, the human slave—whether in the seraglio or the workshop. This understood and it is revolutionary. But from the privileged man's point of view of social progress it is senseless and reactionary. To avoid quibbling and equivocation we must demand the emancipation of the human being. In such terms the question is complete.

From day to day humanity gravitates from revolution to revolution towards its ideal of pefectibility—liberty. But the man and the woman will advance with the same step, the same heart fortified by love, toward their natural destiny, the community of anarchy. But man and woman enter thus arm in arm, the face of one shedding its radiance on the face of the other, until they reach the garden of Social Harmony. But the group of the Human Being, the dream of happiness realized, the animated picture of the future, the harmonic tones and the radiant glory of equality offend your ears and dazzle your eyes. Your understanding, distorted by petty vanity, makes you see in posterity a man-statue erected on a woman-pedestal, a man-patriarch and a woman-servant.

Flogger of woman and absolute serf of man, Proudhon Hagnan, you use your words for a lash. Like a slave-driver you seem delighted to disrobe your beautiful victims (on paper) and flagellate them with invectives. Moderate anarchist, liberal, but not libertarian, you want free exchange of cotton and candles and you seek to protect man against woman in the exchange of affection and human passion. You cry against the great barons of capital, and you would rebuild a proud barony of man on vassal-woman. Logician with misfit eyeglasses, you are unable to read the lessons of the present or the past; you can discern nothing that is elevated or at a distance or in the perspective of the future.

You should know that woman is the mover of man, as man is the mover of woman. There is not an idea in your deformed brain, no, nor in the brain of any other man, that was not given life by woman; not one voluntary motion of your muscles or of your intelligence but what its object has been to attract the attention of woman and to please her, even including that which seems the most contradictory, your insults.

Everything beautiful that man has made, everything grand that man has produced, all the masterpieces of art and of industry, all the discoveries of science, the titanic steps which man has taken into the fields of the unknown, all conquests and all aspirations of man are due to woman who imposes the tasks upon him as a queen of a tournament assigns a task to a knight and rewards him with a smile when he has accomplished it. All man's heroism, all his physical and moral valor comes from love. Without woman he would still crawl on his belly or on all fours and browse on herbs and roots. He would equal the ox in intelligence. He is superior to the beast only because woman has said, "Be so." It is her will that has created him and made him man instead of brute. It is to satisfy the supreme exigencies of the feminine soul that he had attempted sublime things.

See what woman has done for man, and then see what man has done for woman!

Alas! to please her lord and master it is not necessary for her to possess great intelligence and moral force. If she will only mimic the she monkey in antics and grimaces, hang a few bits of glassware to her neck and ears, dress herself in ridiculous finery, pad her hips until she resembles a Hottentot Venus with the aid of whalebone and crinoline, if she knows how to handle a fan like a skimmer, or can make porridge or strum on the piano, that is all her Sultan demands of her, all that is necessary to bring joy to the masculine soul—the alpha and omega of his desires and aspirations. If she can do these things she is rewarded with a lace handkerchief.

She who has regarded such a role as shameful and has shown her good sense by finding beauty in worthiness and by her self-reliant conduct testified to her sane intelligence has been set upon and pitilessly stoned by the multitude of Proudhons, past and present, called a blue stocking and persecuted with imbecile sarcasm and forced to stifle her individuality. For the crowd of heartless and brainless men she has sinned by having too much heart and too much intelligence. They have thrown stones at her and rarely has she the good fortune to meet a man who will take her by the hand and say:

"Woman, rise; you are worthy of love; you are worthy of liberty."

(Conclusion next week.)

Giotto's Impressions.

MY DEAR HELEN: You ask me to write you what I think of "Women and Economics," now; but that is a hard question to answer. I have only a vague idea of the book even now. I could not read it—I could only dip into it. My "dips" into books are not worthless, but my resulting impressions must be far from exhaustively truthful. And perhaps my thoughts about "Women and Economics" lean much toward what it is not rather than to what it is. That would make me seem an ungracious critic, were I asked to criticise. But to you, who care to know what I think because I think it, I can talk freely.

You are reminded of the story we heard about the lover who lived, as all happy lovers do, in the joy of what his mistress was, until his sister appearing on the scene, insisted on drawing his attention closely to all she was not. And I like Mrs. Stetson so much for what she is—really, the book is full of splendid things—that I feel as if I were a querulous fault-finder when I enlarge upon what she is not. And, since I desire to keep on good terms with myself, perhaps I shall not enlarge upon it at any length.

A friend wrote me: "There is a good deal in it, but it gives me the sensation that she (the author) had been living in a house so very bad that in desperation she builds one for herself —very fine in all its make-up, but wholly destitute of the living-room."

But I think she mistakes the lack, or the error in Mrs. Stetson's work. The new house she builds for herself fails less than those now built in the "living-room." That is just the trouble with the family homes of to-day—people do not live in them. They do everything else in them, wash, and bake and fret, but they do not live. And my impression is that Mrs. Stetson has pointed out this fact.

Laura Foster works in her office nine hours a day and her salary is sixteen dollars a month. She does not do it for love of the work. There is nothing to love about routine work. She has a sufficient income apart from her work; she is, as you know, a girl of unusually simple tastes, she is a musical artist in perception, and might become one in execution could she devote four of those nine hours each day to her practice. Her first passionate wants are for leisure and art in her life. These could be met in her home were freedom there. But her home is unendurable. She has told me all about it.

There are a great many Lauras. For women like her there is, in leaving the home for the office, the same feeling of relief, of escape, that one experiences in leaving a small village for a great city. The eyes that one meets are those of strangers from whom one expects no friendliness, at the most no definite interest beyond that of simple human kindliness, but they are easier and pleasanter to meet than the scrutiny of neighbors for whom life holds no keener interest at the moment than to discover if you "have on anything new," if it is becoming, and where you can be going at this unusual hour.

These women who work for nine hours a day must dress acceptably to their employer or he will find others who can; but he will not ask them whether they are going to make over that old dress before they wear it again, or whether they are going directly home after they leave work.

It is in the daily life, daily association with the tyrant that consciousness of the tyranny forces itself upon us. That is one reason why women will sew in attics for twenty-five cents a day rather than enter the "comfortable homes" provided for them at three dollars a week. I am as helpless—and I know myself to be as helpless—under present economic conditions, in the factory as in the kitchen, but my master's orders have a more remote sound. I do not brush his coat while he is wearing it, and his sons do not make me playful overtures which I am expected not to resent.

It is well to have pointed out and insisted upon, that a wife's position is as surely one of both dependence and servitude as that of the horse in the stable. And I think that Mrs. Stetson has done this admirably. I never realized it so vividly before reading her book. But what she does not see is the share that the wife's ideals have in keeping her there. The stable horse can never regain his freedom because there is no possibility of his ever attaining a consciousness of his own power. But he is not held in slavery in consequence of being unable to escape from his own ideal of an eternal, monogamic union.

Dick did not need a very violent "breaking in" to harness, because his ancestors were broken in long ago. Dick's mistress (by courtesy) took as kindly to her home as he to his stable. Dick was bought with "good money" but, having a kind master, he obeys him lovingly. Mrs. Farrar had more choice in a master, loved him first, and later, dreading his displeasure, studied the art of averting it. She "bore to him a son" as the poets in all the ages had phrased it for her. Then she nursed the boy because she loved him, and afterwards trained him as his father wished. Mr. Farrar was an "indulgent" husband, and her situation comparing favorably with that of her neighbors, she is now congratulating herself on a successful life and thinks that something must be quite wrong with those who complain that marriage is a failure.

Is not this Mrs. Farrar and her life?

You must read Shaw's "Quintessence of Ibsenism." He says good hard things in good hard words. These will fit Mrs. Farrar.

"And so, though she is completely disillusionized on the subject of ideal love, yet, since it has not turned out so badly after all, she countenances the illusion still from the point of view that it is a useful and harmless means of getting boys and girls to marry and settle down. And this conviction is the stronger in her because she feels that if she had known as much about marriage the day before the wedding as she did six months after it would have been extremely hard to induce her to get married at all."

GIOTTO.

Great Women of the Past.

BY DORA F. KERR.

I would like, in the interests of historical knowledge, to point out some of the most extraordinary omissions in Mr. James' "nearly complete list" of women of original genius. These omissions are so glaring to the student of either historical proportion or of the peculiar merits of individual genius, that I feel sure that Mr. James must have intentionally laid himself open to criticism in order to invite further discussion. It would be difficult to make a less representative list of very able women than Mr. James' list is, save as to the numerical prominence he rightly gives to women who have been exceptionally successful in political rule.

Zenobia is omitted. Of the two great women sovereigns of Russia, Catherine II. was much more important than Catherine I., and both should certainly be in the list of able sovereigns which contains Isabella of Spain.

In poetry, Sappho is universally admitted to be in the first rank of lyric poets; and this kind of genius is so rare that we may well include two lesser stars, Lady Nairne, the Scotch song writer, not quite equalled by Burns in songs, and Mrs. Browning, as to whom I have heard Prof. Thomas Davidson (of New York) remark that there have been three world-known women poets, Sappho, Lady Nairne and Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Mr. James entirely ignores the able women of France—Georges Sand, Rosa Bonheur and all. Perhaps the most extraordinary omission is that of Joan of Arc, who certainly possessed original genius if ever human being did. To the real lover of history, Joan of Arc stands as a wonderful type of the nation which taught the world an ideal of the noble soldier through ages when there was much soldiering and little nobility of character, a nation which today exercises a penetrating influence on modern progress which has been well compared to the influence of women in the world.

I fully agree with Mr. James that the experiment of educating women is not yet at all complete, and we may look for many more important results of it. No doubt the race that educates its women and encourages them to insist on more practical sociology than has yet been at all generally grasped will be the dominant race in the world and will deserve to be so.

Mr. James' doubt whether men do not spend as much force in propagation as women do is so curious that I must compare it to the belief of the savage tribe, mentioned, I think, by Karl Pearson, among whom it is customary at the time of the birth of a child to put the father to bed as the invalid! But the general experience of mankind and that of physiologists concur in the opinion that very heavy demands are made on the energy of the woman in gestation, child-birth and suckling, to which nothing in the life of the man can be compared, not to speak of the keeping up of a larger and more elaborate reproductive apparatus which is a continual tax on the strength of the woman.

It is certainly true that there have been many fewer women of high genius than men of high genius; but that history can nevertheless show a good many women of genius is worth nothing as a fact bearing on important subjects which are as yet but little understood, while the high place women have taken as able political rulers is very significant.

Samuel P. Putnam's admirers now have an opportunity to possess fine photographs of the late freethought leader. The best likenesses ever taken were the work of Miss Levin, a Russian artist of New York—now dead. Her negatives were purchased by E. C. Reichwald, who is having them printed in large quantities. The cabinet size sells for 25 cents. For 50 cents there is a large picture suitable for framing for the wall. For sale at this office.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 507 CARROLL AVE., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, William Duff, 9 Carfin St., Glasgow Scotland.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

IMPORTANT NOTICE!

Change of Address.

507 Carroll avenue is the present address of our publication house and our family. We are two blocks north of Lake street and one and a half blocks east of Ashland avenue. Out-of-town friends should take the Lake street elevated to Ashland avenue, as it is the easiest way to remember. The Fulton street cars pass one block south of us, and the Paulina and Ashland avenue cars connect with and transfer from most of the east and west lines. Please "paste these directions in your hat" so that you will have them convenient when you come to see us. Friends from out of town often complained of inability to find us when we were on Congress street. We hope they will have less trouble in finding us here. On the elevated trains it takes ten minutes to get here from "down town."

The change has caused unusual delay in the filling of book orders. Our friends, we hope, will excuse us for the delay.

NO LUCIFER NEXT WEEK.

So much time must be taken to arrange our stock, etc., and get settled down in working order, that it is almost impossible to give sufficient thought and care to Lucifer at the same time. Hence we have decided to omit one issue of the paper. Subscribers are credited by number—52 numbers for one dollar—so they will miss nothing by omission of one week's issue.

This change will seem quite sudden to our friends, but as a matter of fact we have long contemplated it. We needed more room, and there were other serious disadvantages connected with the Congress street place. But the thought of moving was quite terrifying, and the worry of it was too much for the editor. The only time to undertake it was in his absence so that he would find all running smoothly on his return. I expected to announce change of address in last issue, but southern Florida is so far away, and descriptions of houses had to be sent there, and then we had to wait for father's decision and then the lease had to be sent for his signature. At the time of going to press last week it was not fully decided which of two houses we would take. At Congress street we had a six-room flat. Here we have a large, roomy house, which I hope will be much better for our business.

DOES THIS APPLY TO YOU?

We have several hundred subscribers on our list whose subscriptions are in arrears. Many of them are good friends who have taken the paper for years, and who we feel sure will pay. But they seem not to realize that their subscription is due. I have been sending out statements to some of these, but my time is so fully taken up with the details of moving that I am unable to send statements to any considerable number of them. If these subscribers would only send in the amount due now we would be able to defray all the expenses of moving and the editor could remain south until warm weather. This is not a "calamity howl"—it is merely a statement that we need what is due us. I feel very hopeful of the future of Lucifer and its work. "United we stand!" LILLIAN HARMAN.

LOIS WAISBROOKER'S present address is Santa Ana, Calif.

IN NEXT issue I shall give some of the responses which I have received to my "Practical Question" regarding "disgraced" mothers. I have received many—though not too many—letters from all over the country, and they make me feel very glad that I wrote the article. They prove to me that all which is needed is to let the people be known to each other—those who need, and those who can give help. I shall have more to say on the subject when I publish the letters. In the meantime, I shall be glad to hear from others who may be able to suggest something for the benefit of women who feel themselves "ruined." L. H.

THE LATEST report from the editor is to the effect that he is feeling stronger in body and mind, but that the general symptoms in the region of heart and stomach are about the same as during the winter. He feels hopeful, however. His last letter was from Kissimee. He expected soon to go to Palmetto, Fla. He will probably remain in the south until warm weather if financially able to do so. The cold and damp and variable weather of Chicago would doubtless be worse than ever for him now.

I have been requested to announce his address in each issue of Lucifer. This is impracticable. It takes two days for a letter to reach me from him. We go to press Wednesday and the paper is mailed Friday. Thus the address would be at least a week old when it reaches our readers. He does not want to be troubled by planning where he will be two weeks ahead, as if he were a commercial traveler obliged to report to the House. Letters may be sent to him at the last address given, and forwarded from there, or can be sent to this office and forwarded to him. Those to be forwarded should be marked "Personal."

The Human Being.

This reply to Proudhon is, in my opinion, a very important contribution to the literature on the subject. I had not intended to publish it in Lucifer, but to make a small pamphlet of it. But the extra expenses incurred in moving and otherwise make me reluctant to undertake any extra publication unless I am sure of sales sufficient to pay the first cost. I hope that the installment published in this issue will be read carefully and those who want to preserve it in pamphlet form will send in their orders at once.

It will make a pamphlet of probably twenty-four pages. The price will be five cents a single copy, twenty copies for fifty cents, or $2 a hundred. Please send in your orders as early as possible.

Free Speech and "The Gatling Gun"

Walter Hurt thinks that Lucifer misrepresented him. He overlooks the fact that the sentence he quotes was written by a correspondent and is not necessarily the editorial opinion. That which I write is not necessarily representative of Lucifer even though I am in charge. Only what Moses Harman writes or endorses can properly be held to be representative of the paper.

This statement seems to be necessary because several papers have recently commented on the words of a correspondent, not naming the correspondent but only Lucifer, giving the impression (as in the case of Mr. Hurt) that the words quoted were editorially expressed.

As a matter of fact, I personally endorsed the opinion of Hosea McCoy, which Mr. Hurt quotes. Possibly I have misread the "Gatling Gun." I hope such is the case. There are all too few workers for liberty, and if Mr. Hurt is one I shall be glad to learn of my mistake in thinking him the reverse.

I have not read a great many articles in the "Gatling Gun." The style was repellant to me. It seemed to me that the editor sacrificed truth to his peculiar style, that he was unjust, abusive and strove to "be funny" at the expense of justice and truth But I have not one copy of the paper at hand by means of which to verify this impression.

I read one article, however, which, if he either wrote or endorsed, placed him in a position in which he personally had no right to protest against any injustice which a stronger power chose to put upon him. This was an article on the race troubles in the south. The writer advocated the total extermination of all negroes and every one who had negro blood in his veins. It was an appeal to all the lowest elements of race hatred to be found in the hearts of his readers. It was a barbarous invocation to mob violence, as undiscriminating, as unjust. It was the most atrocious, cruel and vindictive expression of feeling I have read for a long time. Because some negroes perpetrated the crime of rape, all were to be exterminated by white men, many of whom are also guilty of the same crime. I should like to write more on this subject, but lack of time prevents.

I shall only repeat that if my eyes and my memory did not and do not deceive me, Walter Hurt has no cause to complain of injustice. He advocated injustice for the already wronged and oppressed, and now a stronger power has oppressed him. But the principle is the same, whether attacked in the person of Walter Hurt or of Charles Bradlaugh. Never were truer words spoken than when Bradlaugh said: "Better a thousand-fold abuse of Free Speech than denial of Free Speech; the abuse dies in a day, but the denial slays the life of the people and entombs the hope of the race." Is Uncle Sam a Polygamist?

Mrs. Harriette D. Mealer, a prominent and wealthy woman of Rush county, Kansas, was arrested a week or so ago on the charge of defrauding the United States government. Mrs. Mealer went to Rush county about fifteen years ago with a family of grown children. She had been a widow ever since the civil war, her husband having been killed in battle. She was prominent in society and a leading church worker. Beginning about two years ago, she would go to Missouri frequently, ostensibly to visit relatives, and would remain several weeks at a time. Recently United States detectives followed her and found she went there to visit a man to whom she had been married for two years. She was then arrested. Her crime consisted in having drawn a pension after she had married again.

This statement of facts as related in newspaper dispatches, is significant of the economic dependence of woman. The granting of pensions to widows is based on that idea. The wife is supposed to be dependent on the husband and when the husband is killed fighting for his country Uncle Sam undertakes to provide for her support. But as that support is conditioned upon the woman refraining from marrying again Uncle Sam virtually becomes her husband. If her husband should engage in some hazardous undertaking for another man on condition that he should be paid for it and if he should be killed his widow should be cared for during the remainder of her life by the other man there would be no bar to her second marriage. Of course such a bar could be inserted in the contract, but few husbands would insist upon having it inserted. This is shown by the fact that comparatively few men bind their wives in their wills or in their life insurance policies not to marry a second time.

But in Uncle Sam's case it is not even a contract, for the husband has no option in accepting the pension law. This puts Uncle Sam in the position of being the husband of all the war widows and if they prove so unfaithful to their polygamous husband to marry more satisfactory husbands Uncle Sam cuts off their allowances.

That Uncle Sam is a very immoral fellow, from a conventional viewpoint, is shown by the fact that in such instances he puts a premium upon illicit sex relations, if he does not make marriage virtually a crime. For a pensioned widow may sustain illicit sex relations with one or a dozen or more men and your virtuous Uncle Samuel will not withhold his allowance for her support. He is generous enough to allow her all the liberty she wants, but when she forfeits that liberty by marriage Uncle Sam positively declines to support another fellow's wife.

The Minister and the Women.

BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

I want to tell Lucifer's readers a true story which was told to me by the pastor of one of the most prominent Protestant churches in Chicago a few days ago. I will tell it as nearly as possible in the clergyman's very words. I tell it in order to show how utterly the conscientious ministers of the churches fail to understand the meaning of the natural desires of human beings which God—admitting the existence of a God who created all things and "doeth all things well"—implanted in humanity as well as in other creatures.

"I was called upon in my study a few weeeks ago," said the clergyman, "by a woman who appeared to be about twenty eight years old. She said she was in trouble and wanted to talk to me. I asked what the trouble was, but she seemed to be unwilling to tell. She spoke vaguely and in such a way that I did not know how to advise her.

"'If there is anything I can do for you,' I said, 'I will be glad to do it. Is your trouble of a spiritual nature?'

"'Yes, I guess it is,' she answered.

"'Well, if you feel disposed to tell me what it is I will try to advise you,' I said. She still hesitated and I said, 'Are you a member of any church?'

"'I was once,' she replied.

"'Your trouble is a matter of conscience?' I inquired.

"'Yes,' she answered, but went no further.

"'If you do not wish to tell me what the trouble is I do not see how I can advise you,' I said. 'Perhaps it might help you if I should ask you questions?' She made no objection and I asked if she had been sustaining improper relations with some man. She said she had. I asked her if she was married. She said she was not, and she also said the man was not.

"'Why don't you marry him, then?' I said.

"'I don't think I love him enough for that,' she said, and she added 'I don't think we could get along together if we were married.'

"Well I told her," continued the pastor, "that the only thing for her to do was to stop her improper relations with the man. After giving the matter some consideration she promised me she would do so. A few days ago the same woman came to me again for consultation. As before she said she was in trouble but she seemed unable to command words to tell what her trouble was. I asked her if she had broken off her relations with the man and she said she had.

"'Did he interpose any objection?' I asked.

"'No,' she answered, 'he said he wanted me to do what I thought was right; he acted very nicely about it.'

"'When did you see him last?'

"'Last night.'

"'He doesn't urge you to resume your former relations?'

"'No; he tells me to do what I think is right.'

"'What is the trouble, then?' I persisted. She shook her head and did not answer for several seconds, and then she said:

"'Oh, I am so unhappy, so miserable!'

"I saw she was greatly perturbed and I reluctantly asked her if her own desire to resume the old relation was the cause of her trouble.

"'That's it, exactly,' she exclaimed. 'I am ashamed to say it, but I must tell you; I feel as if I could not live without him. I want to be a good woman, but this desire seems to be unconquerable.'

"I advised her to use all her strength to overcome her temptation and to ask God to give her power to conquer."

That, in substance, is the story the minister told me. I leave the story here for Lillian Harman to make comment on, for a woman can speak best of matters that concern women's nature. I could write enough comment on this case to fill an entire issue of Lucifer, but I refrain in deference to the wishes of those who have complained that too much space in the past has been taken by myself and a few others. I would like, however, for the women readers of Lucifer to write for publication the advice they would have given this woman. In reporting the preacher's conversation I omitted only such words as might possibly give a clew to the woman's identity.

Walter Hurt's Defense.

EDITOR OF LUCIFER: It is a matter for surprise to me that Lucifer should refer to my recent arrest by the federal authorities in such sneering terms. In your issue of February 24, the following sentence is used in speaking of Charles C. Moore and myself: "It is the irony of fate that both these champions of morality should be arrested on charges of immorality."

To the charge of being a champion of morality I plead guilty It was a difference of opinion between my Uncle Samuel and myself as to what constitutes morality that caused my arrest. I read Lucifer every week and had always supposed the Light Bearer to be a champion of morality; that its mission is to correct social evils; that one of its great purposes is to free woman from the galling gyves of sexual slavery; that its aim is to lift the race into the light, lead it up to the morning star; that it contends for those primal principles of natural justice which form the fundamentals of all true morality. If I am mistaken, or if such movements are immoral, I would like to be set right. I cannot countenance any immoral intent. It was the reading of Lucifer that prompted me to write the article on "Sexual Fraud" upon which the affidavit against me is based.

You have further said: "Both . . through their papers have advocated the regulation of other people's affairs." As to Moore I have nothing to say at this time except that I never saw anything obscene in his columns and consider his arrrest and imprisonment a rape of the principle of personal liberty. When he was at large I antagonized him in a fair and manly fashion because I honestly disagreed with his doctrine and disapproved his methods. I have never regarded him as helpful to humanity, but consider his influence as pernicious. Such narrow-minded men are nearly as great nuisances as religious fanatics, and they can only be obstacles in the road to reform. In his own paper he was constantly calling upon the authorities to deprive me of my liberty and suppress "The Gatling Gun." Yet now that he is in the hole I would help him if I could.

I have never attempted to regulate "other people's affairs," although I have advocated the regulation of arrogant abuses which inflict injustice upon the individual. In a recent number of my paper, while making mention of Moore, who had made a vicious attack upon me, I said: "I do not condemn the heathen philosopher for his atheism; I do not condemn anyone except for hypocrisy. And Moore, I think, is honest." Somewhat further along in the same article I said:

"I do not denounce any man because he fails to teach the truth. Mayhap we are all mistaken. Here's my hand to each and all, whether atheist or Christian, Jew or Gentile, who seek to slay the shadows. I have suffered persecution at the hands of doubter and dogmatist alike. I find enough of narrowness on either side. Only from the independent searcher for truth can I hope to receive charity and the comfort of comradeship. And so I am willing to welcome any honest effort toward liberty and the light. I strike only at superstition. I am rewarded for all my labors if I lay a single stone in the foundations of the temple of truth."

Are those the sentiments of a bigot or a dogmatist? And so it is. Through several years of journalistic labor in different parts of the country I have ever been the friend of freedom, a lover of liberty, in favor of fair play. I forever follow the torch of truth, though often I may stumble. It is quite time that all progressive people should put aside intolerance. Not all men may think alike, and we have different ways of doing our work. With a mighty and militant foe confronting us why should we fight one another? Save your shots for the enemy, my brother.

No one should know better than the editor of Lucifer that the charge of "mailing obscene matter" is the most convenient pretext for the persecution of reform publications. But every such arrest, whether it result in conviction or acquittal, marks a milestone on the path of progress. For it serves to direct attention to existing despotism and arouse uneasiness in the public mind. We should not lament too loudly. Every movement for liberation must have its martyrs, and salvation can come only through sacrifice. Yours in a hope for better times,

WALTER HURT, Editor "The Gatling Gun."

The Process of Evolution.

BY HENRY M. PARKHURST.

It is important not to overlook the continuity required in the process of evolution. Before a species can be benefited by the survival of the fittest, there must be a sufficient number who are advanced beyond the rest to enable them to continue the species after those who are less advanced have been exterminated. In the development of man from the anthropoid ape, if the "missing link" had been exterminated too soon, the human never could have existed. The same principle applies to all forms of evolution. A custom cannot evolve into a higher custom unless the lower form is continued until the higher form has become established. The first step to be taken in evolution, is not the destruction of an inferior custom, but the establishment of the superior custom. Even if the inferior custom is entrenched behind forms of law, while it will make advance more difficult, it will not change the order of the advance; for a superior custom cannot be developed out of the ashes of an inferior, but must have its origin while the inferior custom is still full of vitality. Whatever obstacles we find in the way we must "walk directly through them as though they were not there;" and when the higher ideal has become safely established, we can clear away the rubbish of hostile laws or customs which have become dead letters.

Even then the iconoclast will do more harm than good if he does not consider that while a custom he objects to may have been outgrown by a certain class of people, and no longer needed for them, there may be another class of people who have not yet developed up to it, and who will need it in order to escape from still lower customs by which they are dominated. There is a long series of gradations from the highest ideal of the present day down to the ideals of thousands of years ago which are not wholly outgrown.

VARIOUS VOICES.

E. L. Small, North Truro, Mass.—Find enclosed $1 to renew my subscription to Lucifer. Times are not quite so hard with us as some years. I was much interested in the outline sketch of M. Harman's career. I am compelled to say that the paper seems to do well. It certainly loses nothing in interest.

W. H., Ephrata, Pa.—I see by the number on the wrapper of my paper that I owe you one dollar for the best paper printed. You can class me with the few who want knowledge. I am sorry I did not get acquainted with Lucifer sooner in life. You will find enclosed one dollar, so mark me ahead to 799 and oblige yours.

David W. Gilmore, Chanute, Kas.—I am sorry that your father's health failed so that he had to seek a rest and return to health, but I am glad it was possible for him to go when it was necessary for him to do so. The Light Bearer is in charge of an able person in the absence of the editor. I hope his sojourn in the south will greatly benefit your father and that he may live many years to follow his chosen work. I have been a subscriber to Lucifer quite a while, and have no notion of stopping now, therefore I enclose one dollar to renew my subscription, which has just expired.

Ira P. Holcomb, Reedley, Cal.—In Lucifer 752 which I have just finished reading, I find a very interesting letter from S. R. L., of Los Angeles, Cal. Will you kindly send me her address. I am sure I would enjoy a correspondence with her. I would also like to know if there are any radicals in this neighborhood. I am acquainted with a few. Also will you send me the names of as many broad or rather liberal colonies as you know of. Myself and some friends are hoping to go to Mexico this fall and we wish to organize a broad free colony and so would like copies of by-laws, as well as suggestions from their experience.

[Yes, we have subscribers in the vicinity of Reedley, but many people object to having their names given to strangers, so we think it best to publish the request for acquaintance, and let those who desire to do so, respond. No doubt Mr. Holcomb will receive many letters from colonists. L. H.]

H. J. Hunt, 1039 N. Albany Ave., Chicago, Ill.—I feel moved to respond briefly to my old-time comrade, Francis Barry's kindly greeting. For some years pen and tongue have been held in abeyance. I feel that "I stand amid the eternal ways" wait, ing for my own to come to me, and while I wait I listen for

> That grand anthem calm and slow
> That God repeats.

And while I listen I hear what may be the wreck of matter and crash of worlds, but as I look again I see it is only the image-breaker as his axe swings right and left, laying low the Godless (or godly) shrines of man that have so long claimed the allegiance and worship of human reason. Hearts are crushed by the iconoclastic blows, and faith goes glimmering in the dim shadows of doubt and unbelief, and we almost long for the faith we once deemed so sacred and unalterable, safe from profane hands and unholy question. In vain we reach out, to save from the destroyer's axe our most sacred idols, the family, the church, the state, but we find the axe laid at the root of even these. Yet even now our faith in the eternal principles of truth, justice and humanity is founded securely on the Rock of Ages.

James Beeson, Hytop, Ala.—I will ask Messrs. James, Kerr, et al., what they expect to accomplish by criticisms their readers cannot understand, and which they appear not to understand themselves. What difference does it make with people starving and freezing to death what the word chivalry means? Webster says: "Knight errantry—valor." He also explains errantry as roving, and valor as bravery, daring, etc. Of these qualities the James boys and the Younger brothers had enough and to spare. Is Webster right or wrong? and what are they going to do about it in either case? Mr. Kerr defines the word as a deference shown by men for women, but it was always my understanding that it was a word peculiar to the knights of mediæval Europe, and August Spies says that when the knights tired of women captured in their predatory rovings they threw them into a sink hole that had no bottom, at the back of their castles. Of what account are such arguments anyway, and what do they expect to accomplish by them? If they want to air their erudition let them write for such papers as the "Scientific Monthly," "Scientific American," etc. Such articles can have but little worth, if any, in our emancipation from slavery of any kind.

Cynthia M. Tregear, Wellesley, Mass.—Few men have been credited with having done more to free women from sex slavery than has Moses Harman, and for this reason it grieves me very much to see that his pen pictures of the emancipated woman as a mother make her nothing more than a dependent weakling. In the pamphlet "Motherhood in Freedom" which Mr. Harman published some time ago, he gives his ideas of how "The new woman, the emancipated woman, the womanly woman of the future will go about her work as race builder."

After having read Mr. Harman's "Motherhood in Freedom" I have come to the conclusion that he may live long enough to see that his present ideas of the curative work of the new woman, as a race builder, is as foolish a dream as was his faith in the Methodist church and the sons of temperance.

In Lucifer No. 752, Mr. Harman writes that he delivered a leture on "The Ascent of Life—How Evolution Evolves," which brought forth considerable discussion from the audience, and that a Mrs. Emma J. Huff thought that "the motherhood question would settle itself when women became free financially and industrially," and she "urged her hearers to concentrate their efforts upon the work of reforming our financial and industrial systems so that no woman would be dependent financially upon any one else."

Mrs. Huff is on the right road. We cannot have free motherhood until women are free financially and industrially. And let me add that women must be free from the co-operative home with man as well before she can be a free mother.

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thraldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the latest deep into the sclerosis sores of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1.50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN
IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalisation of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 35 cents.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

The Great City.

Where the city stands with the brawniest breeds of orators and bards,
Where the city stands that is beloved by these, and loves them to return and understands them,
Where no monuments exist to heroes but in the common words and deeds,
Where thrift is in its place and prudence is in its place,
Where men and women think lightly of the laws,
Where the slave ceases, and the master of slaves ceases,
Where the populace rise at once against the never-ending audacity of elected persons,
Where fierce men and women pour forth as the sea to the whistle of death pours forth its sweeping and unript waves,
Where outside authority enters always after the precedence of inside authority,
Where the citizen is always the head and ideal, and President, Mayor, Governor and what not, are agents for pay,
Where the children are taught to be laws to themselves and to depend on themselves,

Where the city of the healthiest fathers stands,
Where the city of best-bodied mothers stands,
There the great city stands.

THE HUMAN BEING.

(Letter written to P. J. Proudhon by Joseph Dejacque in 1857. Translated from Les Temps Nouveaux by Jonathan Mayo Crane).

(Conclusion).

No; what man wants—that is, what he who usurps the name of man wants—is not woman in all her physical and moral beauty, the woman of natural and artistic form, her face beaming with the aureole of grace, her heart sympathetic and tender, her thoughts enthusiastic, her soul enamored of poetic and humane ideals. No, that brainless booby, like a footman at a fair, wants a colored and beplumed wax figure. Like a glutton in an ecstacy before a butcher shop, he wants a quarter of veal garnished with lace.

Disgusted with the man she finds such an idiot, weary of him in whom she has sought in vain for sympathy of sentiment, history tells us—alas! I wish it were only a fable, a legend, a Bible story—the woman passes from the biped to the quadruped. Beast for beast. It is natural after all that she should permit herself to be seduced by a greater beast than herself. Then, at last, nature having endowed her with impulses and affections too robust to be extinguished by repression and abstinence, she turns disgusted from humanity and seeks in temples of superstition, in the devotees' aberrations of mind and impulse, the food for the passional hunger of her nature. Failing to find the man of her dreams, she lavishes her affection on an imaginary god, and the priest has replaced the beast of a husband.

Ah! if there are so many abject females and so few real women, what is the cause of it? What have you to complain of, Dandin-Proudhon? You wish it to be so.

I admit that you personally have fought valiantly for the revolution; you have gashed the marrow and the trunk of property and have made the noise of tumult resound afar. You have stripped off its husk and left it exposed to the gaze of the populace; you have shaken down like dead branches and leaves your powerless authoritarian antagonists and have shown the emptiness of the revamped Greek theories of the state socialists, your own included. You have drawn with you through the sinuous avenues of reform all the pack of appetites physical and moral. You have traveled the road and took the others with you. You are tired. You would like to rest, but the voice of logic urges you to follow up your revolutionary deductions and march onward, always onward, lest you be overtaken by those whom you have deluded.

Be then frankly an entire anarchist and not a quarter anarchist, an eighth anarchist, or one-sixteenth anarchist, as one is a one-fourth, one-eighth or one-sixteenth partner in trade. Go beyond the abolition of contract to the abolition not only of the sword and of capital, but also of property and of authority in all its forms. Then you will have arrived at the anarchist community; that is to say, the social state where each one is free to produce or consume according to his will or his fancy without controlling, or being controlled by, any other person whatever; where the balance of production and consumption is established naturally, no longer by the restrictive laws and arbitrary force of others, but by the free exercise of industry prompted by the needs and desires of each individual. The sea of humanity needs no dikes. Give its tides full sweep and each day they will find their level.

Do I need, for example, one sun for myself, one river for myself, one forest for my own, or all the houses in all the streets for my own? Have I the right to become the proprietor of them to the exclusion of others, especially when I do not need them? If I have not that right, is it any more just for me to wish, as under the system of contracts, to measure to each one—according to his accidental ability to produce—just what proportion he should receive of all things; how much of the sun's rays he is entitled to, how many cubic feet of air and of water shall be allotted to him, or the extent of his promenades in the forests; what number or the parts of the houses he may occupy, what streets he may walk in and what streets he must keep out of?

With or without contract, will I consume more than is good for me? Will I take all of the sunlight, all of the air, all of the water? Will I monopolize all of the shade of the trees, all of the streets of the city, all of the houses or all of the rooms of the houses? And if I have a right to the productions of nature, such as the light and the air, have I not also a right to manufactured products, such as the street or the house? Of what use then is a contract that can add nothing to my liberty, but on the contrary most certainly will restrain it?

And as for production, will the activity of my nature be developed all the more by being restrained? It is absurd to assert such a thing. The so-called free workman even in the present state of society, produces more and does his work better than the negro slave. How would it be if he were really and universally free? His productive power would increase one-hundred fold.

But the idlers? you say. Idlers are produced by the abnormal conditions of society. That is to say, when idleness is held in honor and labor in contempt it is not surprising that men are reluctant to engage in labor which repays them in bitter fruit. But in an anarchist community, with the arts and sciences developed as they will be developed in our days, nothing of the kind could be seen. Of course there would be, as there are today, some who would be greater producers than others, and there would be some who would be greater consumers than others, but those most active in producing would also be most active in consuming. The equation is natural. Do you demand proof? Take one hundred workmen at random and you will find the greatest producers are the greatest consumers.

The human organism is supplied with certain precious implements the use of which is genuine pleasure. There are the arms, the hands, the heart, the brain—all made for use—and can you imagine a man voluntarily will let such precious tools rust? In the free state of nature, with its marvels of industry and science where all calls to activity and joyous life, in such a state do you imagine a human being would seek for happiness in imbecile idleness? Nonsense. It would be impossible.

On the soil of true anarchy, of absolute freedom, there would be such diversity among the people—diversity of age, of sex and of tastes—that none would be without congenial society. Equality is not uniformity. That diversity of people and of each succeeding moment of time is just what makes all governments, all constitutions and all contracts destructive of liberty. How can you bind yourself for a year, for a day, for an hour, when in an hour, a day or a year you may think entirely different from the way you thought at the time of making the contract.

Under the conditions of radical anarchy there will be some women, as there will be some men, of more relative worth than others. There will be children and there will be old folks, but all, without distinction, will be none the less human beings and they should be equally free to move in the circles of their natural attractions, free to produce and consume as they see fit, without any parental, marital or governmental authority, without any legal regulations to restrain or to hinder them.

In a society thus constituted—and you ought to know it, you anarchist who pride yourself as a logician—what would you have to say of the sexual infirmity of either the female or male human being?

Listen, Master Proudhon! Before you talk of woman, study her; go to school. Stop calling yourself an anarchist, or be an anarchist clear through. Talk to us, if you wish to, of the unknown and the known, of God who is evil, of property which is robbery; but when you talk of man do not make him an autocratic divinity, for I will answer you that man is evil. Attribute not to him a stock of intelligence which belongs to him only by right of conquest, by the commerce of love, by usury on the capital that comes entirely from woman and is the product of the soul within her. Dare not to attribute to him that which he has derived from another or I will answer you in your own words: "Property is robbery!"

Raise your voice, on the contrary, against the exploitation of woman by man. Proclaim to the world with that vigor of argument which has made him famous as an intellectual athlete, that man, without the aid of woman, is unable to drag the revolution out of the mire, to pluck it out of the filthy and bloodstained rut into which it has fallen; that alone he is powerless; that he must have the support of woman's heart and brain; that in the path of progress they should march forward together, side by side, hand in hand; that man can not attain his goal and endure the fatigue of the journey without the sustaining sympathy and the encouraging caresses of woman.

Say to the man and to the woman that their destinies are to draw nearer together and to understand each other better; that they have one and the same name as they are one and the same being—the human being; that they are, each in turn, the one right and the other the left hand and that in the human identity their hearts are as one heart and their thoughts are inseparable.

Say to them that in this condition only can they be able to sustain and support each other in the journey and the light of their love shall pierce the shadows that separate the present from the future, or civilized society from harmonized society. Tell them the human being, in its relative proportion and manifestations, is like the glow-worm, which shines only by love and for love.

Say that. Be stronger than your prejudices; more generous than spiteful. Proclaim Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, the indivisibility of the human being. Do it; it is for the salvation of the public. Declare humanity in danger; call on man and woman to cast prejudiced invaders out of the frontier of social progress; create a second and a third of September against that other masculine nobility, that aristocracy of sex which would rivet us to customs of the past. Do it; it is necessary. Proclaim it with passion, with genius, trumpet-tongued, make it thunder . . . and you will have well won the esteem of others and of yourself.

JOSEPH DEJACQUE.

The Coming Men and Women Not Lovers.

BY L. D. W.

How many of our cherished idols we see doomed to oblivion by the remorseless strokes of the giant, Progress. Religion, marriage, patriotism, duty, obedience, have been attacked by the iconoclast and are tottering under his blows.

The most sacred of all human institutions, the home and family, are weighed in the balance and found wanting. The submissive wife, the meek, dependent woman, the quiet, unassertive young girl are not modern models of womanhood. One by one our idols are shattered.

Many of us, who without regret, have observed their exit, have fondly clung to one beautiful image that we call love, hoping that it would escape the general destruction. But love is doomed! Love as we have known it, the love that poets idealize in song and verse; that artists preserve in enduring colors; the love that inspires men to deeds of bravery, industry and devotion; that brightens the lives of women, lifting them above the prosaic details of commonplace surroundings; the love that exalts its happy victims into a very paradise of blissful delight, that makes the sunshine brighter, the music of the birds sweeter and the world more beautiful will have no place in the future. This kind of love is to be relegated to the attics and garrets—banished with other broken gods that have served their time.

Men and women of the future will be intellectual, strong logical, well-balanced, self-centered and resourceful in themselves Such people will not be lovers. This conclusion is drawn from observing the nature of those who approximate this standard at present. As more men than women have attained these acquirements, the absence of love, or the inability to love is more noticeable in men than in women.

The man who has reached this stage in evolution may have a feeling of tenderness for women (more or less mingled with contempt), in rare instances he may feel respect and friendship, but he is not, he cannot be a lover in the fullest sense. He will conscientiously and honorably fulfill any financial obligation he may have assumed, he will be gentle, patient, even tolerant toward the women near him, but that is all.

It is not altogether impossible that he may some time during his life experience a really intense attraction that strongly resembles love. He will indulge in its expression to whatever extent it can be done easily, without much exertion or any sacrifice on his part; but to yearn intensely for companionship, to desire her happiness above all things, to admit that his happiness in any degree depends upon her smiles or affection or proximity, to determine to be near her at any cost, to feel that their lives entwine and enfold and depend upon each other—not by any manner of means. The man of this kind scorns such sentiments. These emotions belong to the lovers of the past, or to the men who have not reached this advanced condition.

From the standpoint of utility women as wives or mates are of no value, for owing to the perfection of domestic economy, there is not a single thing a wife can do that a man cannot have done more satisfactorily and at less expense in the general market.

Men seek each other for intellectual companionship, a circle into which women are not admitted and have no place. The warmth and tenderness and intensity of woman's affection is of no value, men are only bored by it. If the self-sufficient man happens in a careless moment to have said or done the things that gave birth to these emotions, he is inwardly if not audibly condemning or damning the silly sentimental women who take themselves and things so seriously.

Women are doomed to suffer most in this death knell of love, for their emotions are more a part of themselves, but suffering is not new to them and they will be all the better after the war is over and join in the sentiment of the new woman who shows the superior happiness of calm, quiet, restful friendship over the fitful, delirious, drunken ecstacies of passion.

How the Laws "Protect" Women

It is not often that the daily press so far forgets its policy as to tell so much truth as did the Chicago "Tribune" of March 20, in the following editorial, under the heading:

THE LEGAL STATUS OF MOTHERS.

That a devoted and irreproachable mother can be arrested and imprisoned in Chicago for "kidnapping" her own child seems almost incredible, yet this is true under the existing statutes of Illinois. A mother has not even a legal right to give permission for her child to be taken a ride on a street car, and if the father wishes to take from her a nursing child and to give it into the care of a baby farm or of a dissolute mistress he can do so and have all the legal machinery of the courts to support his action. And if a mother, to avoid being thus robbed of her child, tries to escape with it to another state, she can be arrested and subjected to a maximum punishment of imprisonment in the county jail for one year and a fine of $2,600.

This is but one example of a score of barbarous anacronisms still existing in the common and statute law of Illinois and of most of the states in regard to the status of mother and child. Mrs. Catharine Waugh McCulloch, an attorney of this city has gathered the most glaring injustices of this sort into a little book of fiction called "Mr. Lex." Mr. Lex, of course, is an impossibly hateful father who takes deliberate advantage of every unjust power which the archaic law gives him, yet each individual act ascribed to him is not only possible, but is supported by actual cases on record, and these are cited by chapter and section. Combined in this form they make an unanswerable brief against the flagrant injustice of the legal fiction by virtue of which the father is sole guardian of his children no matter how vicious and arbitrary his rulings may be.

Under existing laws the father may choose the clothes his children shall wear, the church they shall attend, the kind of work they shall do, the medicines they shall take when they are sick, and the place they shall be buried when they die under his treatment, all in defiance of the mother's wishes or judgment, even though she furnish all the funds for running the father's business. If a daughter at the age of fourteen, falls a victim to a seducer, her father can drive her out of his house and forbid her mother to help the unfortunate girl. If the disgraced girl-mother manages to get something to do and to support her illegitimate infant, the girl's father can go and—with a little maneuvering—collect the money she has earned, for she is still a minor. As long as the father is supposedly in his right mind the mother cannot collect the wages of a child, though the father may collect every cent of such wages and use it all for drink if he pleases. The maximum punishment that can be imposed upon the seducer of a girl of fourteen is to compel him to pay $550 in the course of the first ten years of the infant's life. Even if he does not pay a cent toward the support of the child he can at the end of ten years take the child from the mother who has reared and supported it, and can legally dispossess her and make the child earn wages to keep him in tobacco and whiskey.

If the wife of a worthless husband comes into possession of a legacy she cannot be compelled to hand it bodily over to the husband, but she can be compelled to pay the husband's bills with it. In the supposititious case of Mrs. Lex she is compelled to pay for her husband's trousers, for his medicines, and even for his tobacco, upon the theory that he is the lord and master of the family, and that these things are necessary for the support of the family. If anybody doubts the tobacco item he will find it supported by a specific case in the Illinois Appellate Court records. In the words of Mrs. McCulloch, "a mother is eligible to all duty, all burden, but ineligible to receive benefit in the shape of wages, and ineligible to direct the expenditure of her own funds."

There is not a shadow of question as to the validity of Mrs. McCulloch's indictment of the legal code in relation to the status of mother and child. Three-fourths of our states, including Illinois, still make the fathers sole guardians and custodians of children, and deprive mothers of such authority. The whole idea is a relic of feudalism if not of barbarism—a survival of the law that came into being when the fathers apparently possessed all the intelligence as well as all the strength and all the property. The only reason that these absurd and abominable injustices of the common law are not wiped out is that the majority of fathers do not avail themselves of their legal rights. But there are too many cases where worthless husbands take advantage of their unjust powers. Every legislator would do well to read Mrs. McCulloch's booklet. The laws on this subject will never be worthy of a civilized nation until they are changed so that fathers and mothers may be joint guardians and custodians of their children, with something at least approximating equal responsibility and authority.

The following is taken from a short story in the "Times-Herald" and shows the immoral tendency of the popular taste. Nothing so evil could appear in Lucifer:

"Nina—Then I fell in love. He was a barrister, rich and kind and very clever; we were engaged—I was acting at Brighton. He was going abroad and he persuaded me to go and stay at the Metropole a few days first. He said it didn't matter. (Nina spoke jerkily and with a sob in her voice). We were to be married immediately on his return, and—and—then, he grew tired and stayed away. Nella, that's all—you see I am not fit for you to know."

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 507 CARROLL AVE., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, B. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, William Duff, 9 Carfin St., Glasgow Scotland.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE LATEST news from the editor was contained in a letter written at Lake Helen, Fla., Thursday, March 23. He was "not feeling as well as usual—some fever and headache." He had expected to go to Palatka on that day. On the outside of the envelope was written, "Friday morning—Have concluded to stay here till to-morrow. Nothing very serious the matter—as I think."

Leroy Berrier Pardoned.

We learn through the newspaper dispatches that on March 11 "The President pardoned Leroy Berrier, convicted in Minnesota in March, 1898, and sentenced to two years in prison and to pay a fine of $500 for sending obscene literature through the mails. It is stated that the testimony before the court did not show that the matter complained of was in fact obscene, but had the approval of many reputable physicians."

We had expected to learn more of the particulars, but up to the time of going to press no further news had arrived. Mr. Berrier is to be congratulated on attaining his freedom—a freedom, it is to be hoped, unrestricted by promises of silence to be maintained by him in the future.

The Fate of Lieutenant Wark.

C. L. Swartz comments in "I" on this case as follows.

"Three years' penal servitude is the commutation of the sentence of death passed upon Lieutenant Wark, of Liverpool, who was convicted of being an accessory to his sweetheart's death, which was the result of an attempt at abortion. It was shown at the trial that Wark was miles away on military duty at the time of the tragedy and for some time previous; but Mrs. Grundy was well represented on the jury and he had to feel her wrath at the fact that he had dared to be sexually intimate with a woman who loved him but was not his wife. And there was not a person who was more grieved at the woman's death or who would have done more to save her life than her lover. The commuted sentence is possibly less severe than the original —no less unjust."

"The Broadest Liberty."

This is the title of an admirable address by Dr. J. H. Greer, (author of "A Physician in the House") which he delivered before the Spiritualists' Convention recently held in this city. Though Dr. Greer is a graduate of "regular" schools of medicine, and is not a Spiritualist, he upholds the right of the people to choose their modes of treatment from any school, whether that school be "regular" or "irregular," "Christian" or "Mental" or any other so-called "Science."

"If we are to have state medicine," he says, "if the people are incapable of correct judgments as to physicians why not have state supervision over all the affairs of life and declare at once that the people are fools and cannot think for themselves? In my opinion we need protection from only the legalized quacks who are striving to subvert the liberties of the people."

The address is published in full in the "Medical Liberty News," Chicago, and the price is five cents a copy.

On the West Coast.

PALMETTO, FLA., March 16, '99.

The middle of March finds me enjoying the sea-breezes that blow landward from Tampa Bay, a most beautiful sheet of salt water, about fifty miles long and ten to fifteen wide, situated near the center, north and south of the west coast of Florida. It finds me also enjoying the hospitality of our old-time friend and generous helper, Dr. H. B. Houghton, formerly of Paris, Texas, but for the past twelve or more years located at this quiet and unpretentious seaport, a village of some five or six hundred inhabitants, about fifty miles directly south of Tampa, the chief city of West Florida and lately famous as a military camp and point of embarkation for the United States army. Vessels sail for Havana every night from Tampa.

Like many other towns in Florida, east and west, Palmetto is something of a winter resort for tourists in search of health. In the pleasantly situated and remarkably home-like cottage of Dr. Houghton I was most agreeably surprised to meet Dr. Lorinda Brown of Rockford, Ill., wife of Dr. G. W. Brown, of that place, author of "Researches in Oriental History," and other books (which can be obtained by addressing him or the publishers, the "Progressive Thinker" Co., Chicago, Ill.) and known everywhere as one of the most distinguished of the pioneers in the great anti-slavery conflict in Kansas. It was he who edited and published the "Herald of Freedom," the first "Free State" paper published in Kansas. I was glad to find here also, Lucifer's faithful friend and correspondent, Jay Chaapel, whom I had unexpectedly met two weeks ago at the camp near Lake Helen, and whom I had not seen before for some ten years. During these years Bro. Chaapel has been in the east, in New Hampshire, Maine and Massachusetts, occupying his time chiefly as correspondent of the various Spiritualist papers. His address for some months will be at this place.

Monday morning, March 6, in company with Bro. Chaapel, I left Lake Helen and took train for Kissimmee, Fla., situated about fifty miles in a southwesterly direction from the "Southern Cassadaga" encampment. Having to wait three hours at Orange City Junction on the Key West railroad, we concluded to visit the famous Blue Springs, situated near the St. Johns river, and one and a quarter miles from the station. To one who has seen the big springs of Missouri and other western states this Florida spring will not be so impressive on account of the great outflow of water as on account of the deep blue color, the strong odor of sulphur and the high temperature—about 75 degrees Fahrenheit—of its waters. The spring affords water enough to float a good sized steamboat, and could doubtless be used in propelling the machinery of large factories to good advantage. As yet the surroundings of the spring are in a state of nature. The verdure is luxuriant and semi-tropical. Most conspicuous is the "cabbage palm" that grows to the height of forty or fifty feet, the name "cabbage" being given it because the central part or "bud" is edible, being eaten raw or cooked, the taste resembling our common cabbage. This bud is so large that an average specimen is sufficient to make a dinner for a large family. The leaves are used for fans and for making hats, baskets, etc.

At Kissimmee I found an old friend and former subscriber of Lucifer, A. J. Gardner, who gave me a right cordial greeting, and who again allows his name to be enrolled upon our subscription books. Kissimmee, the county seat of Osceola county, is pleasantly situated on the west side of Lake Tahopekaliga, at the head of navigation on a chain of beautiful lakes, which with the canal and river connections stretch in a serpentine course southward to Lake Okeechobee, then westward to the Gulf of Mexico, a distance of 375 miles. It is in the direct line of travel from Jacksonville the "Gate City" of the state, to Tampa, the metropolis of the Gulf coast. Geographically Kissimmee enjoys a very fine position, and for those in search of a semi-tropical climate and opportunities to engage in the sugar business, or in vegetable growing for northern markets, or in the culture of the orange, the pineapple, grape-fruit, figs, apricots, etc., besides the more common fruits such as peaches, strawberries, grapes, melons, etc, etc.—this region holds out superior inducements.

To the pilgrim and sojourner in search of health this locality this locality has also its attractions. At the home of our good friends the Steffees, located on Shingle Creek, three miles west of Kissimmee, I spent a most delightful week—or nearly so, and on leaving was urged to stop off when returning from the west coast, and stay with them another week—or longer if I could spare the time. One of the very pleasant incidents of my visit here was a day's fishing and picnicking. Though not a disciple of Isaac Walton, I am sufficiently carniverous to enjoy eating a fresh-water bass nicely broiled on the coals. Our party of five caught twenty-two medium-sized bass, of which number it was my luck to land five. Our picnic cloth was laid under the wide-spreading branches of a large cypress tree, among the "knees" of the old patriarch. I had often read of "cypress knees," but could form no conception of what they were like. These knees are simply protuberances or wart-like growth from the root of the cypress tree, presenting a wholly unique and indescribable appearance. They are hollow, and grow to the height of three or four feet from the ground.

The whistle of the mail boat reminds me that I must bring this letter to a close if I would get it off today. This is not a railroad town and there is but one mail boat per day. Hoping to hear good news from the great "Windy City," as well as from friends and helpers everywhere, I once more sign myself

Yours hopefully and fraternally, M. HARMAN.

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

Our old-time friend, C. F. Hunt, likes to see a "variety of topics even in a small paper." As a reader, so do I, but as editor pro tem., I look ahead and shudder, for I see looming up before me many two-column articles in defense of Astrology, Koreshanity, Malthusianism, etc., all of them laboriously demonstrating that Mr. Hunt doesn't know what he is talking about. And if I do not publish every one I will be reproachfully reminded by each aggrieved author that "It would be different if our Chieftain were in the editorial chair!" Really, I wonder how many of Lucifer's readers confine their periodical reading supply to this one paper? I wish we could publish a paper large enough to fairly deal with every question before the people—something like the "Free Review" used to be, for instance. But I presume it will be several years before we can attain this ideal. In the mean time, it seems difficult enough to make ourselves understood in the one field of reform which Lucifer cultivates. The woman question is an old story to Mr. Hunt, but he must remember that but a small proportion of Lucifer's readers have, as he has done, read it for fifteen years or thereabouts. Lucifer must speak to the new readers as well as to the old.

The tendency to generalize from one's limited individual experience is said to be a "feminine characteristic," but a brother falls into that error this week. "N. P. S." assumes that because his wife does not permit him to read Lucifer we are wasting our time—we are trying to "help women who want no help." On the contrary, we are striving to stimulate a feeling of independence, of self-respect, in both men and women by means of which they will attain strength sufficient to help themselves.

* * *

Sometimes we receive such a letter as that by N. P. S., but more frequently a woman writes that her husband objects to her reading Lucifer and she must therefore cease subscribing. I know many such stories. Some time ago a woman who has written articles for Lucifer which have been highly praised, informed us that her husband made her so much trouble that she must stop taking Lucifer in her own name, but she had it come to her box. It went in that way for several months, but one day the postmaster handed her mail to her husband—then there was more trouble. She thought it necessary to have it stopped, but she is determined that some day she will again subscribe.

* * *

Here is another instance in which woman proved to be bound more by the weakness of her will than by the adverse circumstances which she blamed. Some years ago a young woman read Lucifer when she could get it—which was not very frequently. She could not receive a paper or a letter through the mail without her husband demanding to see it. He threatened to shoot any one who would write to her. She lived in a small western town, and was by his jealousy almost entirely cut off from all companionship. She said if only she could support herself and her child she would not endure that life for a day. Well, time went by, and an uncle died and left her some money. "Now," she said, "I would leave my husband, but I can't take my baby away and I can't bear to leave it." And so she remained. After a time her boy, too, died. Now she would surely leave her husband. She made her plans, even to the time of starting—but she weakened, and there she remains to this day, so far as I know. She was too weak to carry out a resolution. "He has rights who dares to take them, and taking, dares maintain."

We Return Thanks for the "Repudiation."

"The Truth Seeker" says: "Mr. Walker speaks for the social radicals known as free lovers, and his indignation at Mr. Moore's repudiation of free love is natural enough." On the contrary, as my article clearly and unmistakably shows, I attempted to speak for the consistent friends of free press and mails, wholly regardless of any opinions any of them might hold concerning any other question. I was disgusted and indignant because Moore threw away a splendid opportunity to defend liberty of expression. Free lovers thank him for one thing only—his "repudiation" of their principles; for the same reason that other freethinkers would be glad of the chance to thank him for repudiating theirs. Moore is nothing as a representative of vital ideas, but the reversal of the judgment against him is imperatively required.—E. C. Walker.

Men, Women and Love.

BY M. FLORENCE JOHNSON.

"The Coming Men and Women not Lovers" has been handed to me for comments.

"The most sacred of all human institutions, the home and family are weighed in the balance and found wanting. The submissive wife, the meek, dependent woman, the quiet, unassertive young girl are not modern models of womhnhood."

With this I freely agree. The advanced, intellectual, educated woman has found out that "sacredness" is a superstition used in marriage as an altar for the sacrifice of womanhood.

"Sacred. Pertaining to God or to religion; holy; divine—" "Sacrifice. An offering to God; destruction or surrender of any thing for the sake of something else."—Webster.

Thus "sacred" implies sacrifice. Through the ages the woman has sacrificed her personality for "the sake of something else." Instead of a thinking, self-reliant woman she has been a "submissive wife, the meek, dependent woman."

L. D. W. goes on to say, "The men and women of the future will be intellectual," etc., then in the next paragraph there is as much of a distinction made for man in her social code, as the church and conventionality make in the moral code. Old-fashioned love man will not want, and women will, seems to be her inference. As woman is allowed intellectual advancement she changes her own condition and gets a better. I have yet to be convinced that intellectual development results differently in the sexes. If "well-balanced, self-centered" persons love less, the statement must be true of both men and women. If love is necessary to life, and cannot be had by intelligent, free men and women, let us stop education, close schools, public and private, and leave the human race to love and happiness. We might gain a little light by visiting the districts of our cities where those without education live. See if the husband and wife love each other, and both love their children more than our educattd men and women love. The meek, submissive wife, as a rule, expects no real demonstration of love. If her husband is a kind owner, she compares herself with the wives who are beaten and abused and considers herself a fortunate woman. This may be the result of our civilization, but take savages—would L. D. W. be satisfied with the love there manifest?

"The love that poets idealize in song and verse." Does she imply that the poets were ignorant, weak, illogical, unbalanced, wavering and dependent creatures? If not, then intellectual, strong, well-balanced men appreciated love, and they appreciate it now.

"Owing to the perfection of domestic economy, there is not a single thing a wife can do that a man cannot have done more satisfactorily and at less expense in the general market." There have always been men with property enough to hire a housekeeper. Did such men love their wives less than those who had to see the women they loved overworked with the care of house and children? Or did freedom from such labor give both parties time for enjoyment?

This is a transition state in the home. Intellectual people do not like the old-fashioned kind. Those who see its defects before they enter it, keep out, and it will take time to make each one create what would be liked as a substitute. When it is formed, it will be difficult to find others who have the same ideals to join in that home. Many men and women who appear not to yearn for companionship, do yearn for it, but where is it to be found? Let a man be found such as L. D. W. would love most, could she agree to be the companion he would desire to associate with constantly? Is her life cast in such environments that she could freely live her life if intellectual men were proved to be her ideals?

We are all imprisoned in the walls of conventionality, and though we may hate it, and declare we have no respect for it, we must submit in a measure to superior force. If all acquaintances are to hold a club over our heads ready to strike us for a free expression, and every one of them feel they are doing right, we waver in our thought, sometimes wondering if we are mistaken, and we stay indoors in our living rather than be clubbed for stepping into the free air.

I believe men and women suffer equally in this change. I also believe, even the absence of love, that some of us experience, is no less suffering than we would have in the homes that were considered best by our parents—a quiet sisterly and brotherly love existed in the best of them. We compare our condition with our desire instead of with former possibilities.

There is some man starving for "the warmth and tenderness and intensity of woman's affection," every time I believe.

I hope the sacrifice will be left out of love, and that men and women can express their tenderest emotion without considering they are thereby enslaving themselves for the future. Love has been a beautiful trap, that when once in you were imprisoned at hard labor for life, however much you had been mistaken in your choice.

A man could answer this much better than a woman, but I resent for man the assertion that "he cannot be a lover in the fullest sense." When men reach that state of development wherein love is not necessary, women will also be there. While I have a desire for love I believe others have the same.

"Men seek each other for intellectual companionship, a circle into which women are not admitted and have no place." Perhaps some men do occasionally, so do some women, like a private visit with women. It is usually in both instances where there is not intellectual emancipation, and they consider some subjects too "sacred" to be discussed by both sexes. WALKER, where are you? Invite L. D. W. to Manhattan Club, Sunrise Club and Lucifer Circle.

The old home is going. The old governmental love and subjection is going, the duty and sacrifice are going. We miss them as we miss the horse cars when we take the electric cars, as we miss care of stoves when we move where we have steam heat, as we miss the candle we had to mould. We miss the man around every day telling us our duty, and giving us carresses when we please and frowns and censure when we displease, but we may when free enjoy the love that is awakened by appreciation. Those who understand less than I, must have a less appreciation of love than I. Those who have better developed natures than I must feel more appreciation. One hour's comradeship between a woman and a man "intellectual, strong, well-balanced, self-centered and resourceful in themselves" must give more pleasure, more real joy than the life of a savage could contain or appreciate.

"One thrill of the soul of Shakespeare outvalues the gathered experiences of a whole race of Calibans." Give me moments with great experience, rather than years of sacrifice, duty and obedience to one once loved. We are exchanging the government of home for the society of love.

Brief Comments.

BY C. F. HUNT.

I notice that Malthusianism is referred to as "a well-established law." Well established rubbish. Will some one name a single food plant or animal, in common use as such, which does not increase as rapidly as man? Then we will be better able to believe that all do not.

I have received a book entitled "The Science of the Millennium" from San Francisco. If any one else has a copy I wish he would inform me whether I am crazy, or if it is the book. The burden of it seems to be "surrender self," reiterated in a thousand different ways, in very bad grammar. What there is left of one when self is surrendered, does not appear.

Those to whom Francis Barry threw boquets ought at least to make a bow. I am competing with Bro. Barry as regards modesty, and have concluded to let Lucifer be for, of and by woman. I like a variety of topics even in a small paper. Even with a million phases, the subject woman cannot always interest. I admit all that woman claims—then close the subject. Except when she claims supremacy. A woman can be the worst of tyrants when guided by religious fervor, or fanaticism, as she is liable to be.

A man handed me a circular lately describing Koresh Teed's philosophy. In the matter of "rising again" truth cannot compete in agility with a well-told lie. Teed has been ridiculed, refuted and logically driven into the turf, but he rises after the crusher passes over him and declares it never touched him. Because a level line extended meets the line of the ocean at the horizon, Teed says the ocean is concave. The two sides of a street seem to meet at a point some miles away. Are the sides of a street therefore concave?

Pope Leo's late encyclical letter is lauded by all devout prelates who draw a good salary. Mr. Leo denounces as false the idea "that in order to more easily attract those who differ from her, the church should shape her teachings more in accord with the spirit of the age and relax some of her ancient severity and make some concessions to new opinions." But soon after remarks, "The church has, guided by her divine Master, a kind and merciful spirit, for which reason from the very beginning she has been what St. Paul said of himself: 'I became all things to all men that I might save all.'" If the faithful can tell what to do after reading both the above infallible truths, it simply proves the superiority of faith over logic.

I have been looking into astrology. I learn that if a child is born when Jupiter is in Pices, he will have big feet; and if a comet passes the meridian at 9:47 p. m. he will be troubled with warts. Like all other dogmatists these believers never prove fundamental points? Does a planet affect the nature of a child, and how? Why at birth rather than any other time? Birth is not a critical point in the formation of its mental or physical qualities. The constellations are so far away that they cannot influence a planet in conjunction any more readily than in opposition. Let us get down to earth and have fun thinking that if a brindle cow jumps into the garden just as a chick is breaking its shell, the latter will afterwards be a progressive, rather iconoclastic fowl, not liable to lose its toes in winter, or if three neighbors' small boys' dogs howl in unison, then the south meadow should be plowed for wheat. I like practical things.

Yes!

We must all salaam to what some old sons-of-guns in the past laid down as the Law and Gospel.

But, I am proud to say that there be American preachers, physicians, statesmen and others, who defy King Custom and order their respective lives on the lines of Freedom.

They suffer for it, however—suffer in more ways than one—suffer in Purse and Person—

Suffer at the hands of men and women who call themselves Christians.

Christians?

The fabled Avernus is so full of just such Cur-r-ristians that their legs are sticking through its every window.

If I write bitterly, it is because I feel bitterly, for a friend of mine—Walter Hurt, of the Cleveland (O.) "Gatling Gun" has been taken into custody for daring to criticise Hanna—for defying that demagogue and all his dollars.

Of course the pimps who instigated the arrest, made it upon a different plea—declaring that Hurt was circulating obscene literature through the mails contrary to the Law and Gospel
Of Puritania—the "obscene" literature in question being the "Gatling Gun" itself!

Well, good gentlemen, all, I am proud as a prince to say that Walter Hurt has honored me enough to publish certain sentiments of mine in his "Gatling Gun," and if there had been even one line of indecency in that "periodical of the period" I never would have written a word for it—never.

All who know me, know this, and all who know Walter Hurt know that he is a pure, noble, grand young gentleman, whose very soul shrinks back from all that is Vicious or Vulgar.

But he has been made a prisoner, just as hard and hearty, and now it behooves every American who is half a man—who believes in the liberty of the press—who wants to perpetuate the ideas and instincts crystalized in the creed of Jefferson—it behooves him, I say, to rally round this young man and to see him through his trouble. VARIOUS VOICES.

N. P. S., Dundee, Mich.—LUCIFER THE LIGHT BEARER, Respected and beloved: Inclosed find fifty cents to balance my indebtedness to you. You will kindly discontinue your weekly visit to me; not because I do not like you, not because I do not agree with you and your sentiments, all of which I know are truths, but because it causes "hell" in my environments. If your contributors knew what I know they would not waste time in trying to help women who want no help, but are incessant night and day in forging chains under the law of marriage to bind men. My wife hates you and your teachings simply because she aims to enslave man. She does not want liberty.

E. J. P., Tacoma, Wash.—During the past few months I have become acquainted with Anna Marcus—a woman who dares. The first week of January she gave birth to a free child, a fine boy, which she named George Marcus Cowell. She says her heart has been craving him for ten years. He true woman's pride of her love child made me call her one of the Madonnas of freedom. She is a Russian woman of twenty-eight years, mentally and physically qualified to be a mother to the better man.

Her companion, F. A. Cowell, is known to most of the radicals as one of the ablest writers in the cause of liberty. Both "Free Society" and "Discontent" received recognition through his writings. His pen is idle through no fault of his. Their address is Lake Bay, Wash. Good luck to the free couple and their free child.

W. J. Kent, Norman, Oklahoma.—The book you sent me came all right and here are seventy cents, fifty cents for the paper covered book and twenty cents to pay postage on the two books. I can't help you much, but every little helps I suppose. If the doctors E. C. Walker speaks of in article in last Lucifer could read it possibly it might open their minds to thought. Mr. Walker has never been given any more space in Lucifer than suits me.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

At last we have a cheap and good American edition of this incomparable creation of the Astronomer-Poet of Persia, as rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Once read, 'The Rubaiyat" is read again and again and each time with new insight and delight.

It is the wish of Swinburne that the rich gift of Omar Khayyam of Naish apur may "be tasted in that most exquisite English translation, sovereignly faultless in form and color of verse, which gives to those ignorant of the East a relish of the treasure and a delight in the beauty of its wisdom." With sketch of Omar's life. Symbolical cover. Price 10 cents. Address Edwin C. Walker, 244 W. 143d Street, New York City.

THE BALLAD OF READING JAIL. BY C. 3.3.

This powerful poem of more than 600 lines, is the work of OSCAR WILDE, C.3.3 having been the poets prison number during his confinement in Reading Jail. It is dedicated to the memory of a trooper of the Horse Guards who was hanged in the jail at that time, and it depicts the terrible sensations of the author and his fellow prisoners before and after the execution.

The Flaming Meteor,

Only published book of Will Hubbard-Kernan's marvelous poems which, though most of them are in a decidedly pessimistic vein, strike the lancet deep into the obscene sores of existing social customs. Many of the poems are regarded by good judges as unsurpassed in English literature. The book is handsomely bound in cloth with gilt title and has 270 pages. Kernan is now out of employment, as a result of his persistent refusal to bow to "King Custom." Until April 15 for every book of his poems sold from this office at the regular price we will turn over to the author 25 cents. The price of the book is $1.50.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Kari Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 256 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Ideala was a woman too thoughtful, too honest, too true for the conventional "middle class" English society in which she lived. Her life story furnishes much food for thought for those who like to study the facts of life when disguised as fiction. 195 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth, with silver lettering. Price, postpaid, 35 cents.

Free Society is an advocate of Anarchist Communism, and in its advocacy of liberty in all things does not overlook sexual liberty. It is an eight-page weekly published at 50 cents a year. A specimen copy will be cheerfully furnished upon request. We also publish a monthly Anarchist library. If you want two good treatises on our theories send 10 cents for Kropotkin's "Law and Authority" and Malatesta's "Talk About Anarchist Communism." Nos. 1 and 2 of our new monthly. Free Society, 10 Oak Grove Ave., San Francisco, Cal.

HUMAN RIGHTS: By J. Madison Hook. With an introduction by E. C. Walker. "Liberty is the guiding star of all lands, all races." Chapter I., Rights; Chapter II., Invasion; Chapter III., Co-operation; Chapter IV., Individualism; Chapter V., Liberty. Price, ten cts.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Hear all sides, then decide." 23 chapters; 478 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eye-witnesses, the threats of mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.37, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which their dirt print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific. Price, 10 cents.

Personal I would like to become acquainted with the friends of freedom living in Minneapolis, St. Paul and vicinity, and especially of women believing in Ruedebusch's "New Ideal." Please address M. N., 907 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

"THE EAGLE AND THE SERPENT" teaches that the people must save themselves by their own pride, their own wit and their own daring or be forever damned. "The great are great only because we are on our knees. Let us rise." Editor, E. McCall, 185 Fleet street, E. C., London, Eng. We will forward samples at half price, five cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 13. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, APRIL 8, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 756.

Face the Light!

There's a ringing, glorious measure
In the march of life, my brothers:
If we listen, we may hear it all day long,
With an undertone of triumph
No discordance ever smothers,
And this is the cheerful burden of the song:
"Forward! keep the column moving!
Perfect rest shall be our guerdon
When our missions are fulfilled—war labors done;
Duty's path lies plain before us,
Whatso'er our task and burden,
If we bravely set our faces to the sun.

"Disappointments may o'ertake us,
Losses, griefs and grim surprises
May assault us on the weary way we go;
Look not back; but onward, ever.
Lo! the goal before us rises,
And the valley of the shadow lies below!
With a hand to help the fallen,
Where the rugged steeps delay us,
Though the reddening summits warn us of the night,
We shall conquer all the evils
That assail us and betray us,
While we keep our faces bravely to the light

"Steady! keep the ranks in motion!
Though we only be retrieving
The disasters and mistakes of yesterday,
There is shame in dull inaction,
There is glory in achieving
If we take one step on the upward way!
Day by day the distance dwindles,
Foot by foot the steeps surrender
And we dread no more the barriers overpast;
While we breathe the airs serener,
And our eyes behold the splendor
Of the gates where we shall enter in at last
Wayside thorns may rend and goad us,
Driving mist and cloud may blind us,
As we struggle up the last stupendous height;
But remember and take courage,
All life's shadows lie behind us,
While we keep our faces bravely to the light."

The Causes of Progress.

BY R. B. KERR.

In a recent number of Lucifer allusion was made to a saying of Chauncey Depew that "all progress is the result of illogical actions." Lucifer's treatment of the subject seemed to me rather inadequate, and made me think how few people there are in the world who have a clear idea of the various stages of progress through which the human race has moved, and the causes which made it advance from stage to stage. The reason no doubt is that the fundamental law of progress was first revealed to the world as lately as 1859, and by a biologist, Charles Darwin. All theories of progress anterior to the "Origin of Species" are now quite out of date; yet the Darwinian theory has not only failed to become popular, but has not yet been clearly understood even by our best modern historians.

The fundamental cause of past progress, the backbone of history was natural selection, or the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence. The fundamental fact which made natural selection possible was the tendency of all plants and animals (including man) to multiply beyond the means of subsistence. As Darwin himself puts it, "There is no exception to the rule that every organic being naturally increases at so high a rate that, if not destroyed, the earth would soon be covered by the progeny of a single pair. Even slow-breeding man has doubled in twenty-five years, and at this rate, in less than a thousand years, there would literally not be standing room for his progeny."

Given this fundamental fact of over-multiplication, and the rest is simple. There being too many for the means of subsistence all cannot survive. Naturaly those best fitted to the surrounding conditions will, on the average, be more likely to survive, and to be succeeded by offspring like themselves. Thus we have the law of the survival of the fittest, which has from age to age preserved the brainy and brawny to continue the race, and has weeded out the weaker vessels.

The three great agencies to which the weak have succumbed in human history have been starvation, disease and war; and these therefore have been the chief promoters of natural selection. Of starvation and disease little need be said. The rapid disappearance of savage before civilized races shows what disease can do; and the early deaths of the poorer classes speak eloquently to the united power of starvation and disease. But war is peculiarly interesting to us, because it is to war that we owe the beginnings of our great and complex social institution. In war it is not so much the strength and cunning of the individual that succeed, as the cohesion and solidarity of the tribe among themselves. In war unity is strength, and individuality is a curse the moment it interferes with unity. Thus the first great problem of early society was to crush individuality and subject everyone to the iron rule of military despotism and tribal patriotism. The principal agent in achieving this was superstition, which is now regarded as the great engine which enabled some tribes to overcome the rest. Thus the principal parts of the world fell into the hands of races with highly elaborated religious systems, and with a complex system of laws primarily based on superstition.

As time went on, however, secondary causes of progress became very important. Among the chief was the gradual growth of the arts and sciences. The beginnings of these date back to an incalculably remote period, but real progress in them was first made possible by the establishment of slavery. The world owes much to the men who first had the sense to keep their captives and make them work instead of putting them to death. When every man had to fight and forage for himself, there was little time for brain work; but the establishment of a leisured class by means of slavery at last made a class of thinkers and inventors possible.

Yet slavery alone could not have accomplished that, had it not been aided by superstition. Slavery alone would only have given us a brutal fighting and hunting class, like the feuda lords of a few centuries ago. But superstition gave us the priesthood, who managed to gain an intellectual domination over both the fighters and the toilers, the masters and the slaves, and to discover by degrees the rudiments of the arts and sciences. As Bagehot tells us in "Physics and Politics,"

"Little popular and little deserving to be popular nowadays as are priestly hierarchies, most probably the beginnings of science were made in such, and were for ages transmitted in such. An intellectual class was in that age only possible when it was protected by a notion that whoever hurt them would certainly be punished by Heaven. In this class apart discoveries were slowly made and some beginning of mental discipline was slowly matured."

It thus appears that the most important causes of our progress in the past have been over-multiplication, starvation, disease, war, slavery and superstition. Nowadays we live in what Bagehot calls "the age of discussion," but we must never forget that the most marvelous triumphs of progress, which have done most to make us what we are, were achieved in ages when discussion was a poison utterly fatal to the tribe or nation which tolerated it. Hard hitting, not high thinking, was the thing which the world needed then. We must also remember that, even now, ideas and enlightenment are by no means the one thing needful. I cannot do better than quote Herbert Spencer's answer to Comte's statement that "Ideas govern and overthrow the world":

"Ideas do not govern and overthrow the world; the world is governed or overthrown by feelings, to which ideas serve only as guides. The social mechanism does not rest finally upon opinions, but almost wholly upon character. . . The modification of men's moral natures, caused by the continuous discipline of social life which adapts them more and more to social relations, is therefore the chief proximate cause of social progress."

On the whole, the above is rather a sad story; but I did not invent it. Some tender-hearted Luciferites will say that they do not like natural selection, and that they wish population did not tend to outrun the means of subsistence, even if that fact has done so much for us. Well, it is never too late to mend. Science has now taught us to limit population, so that with limited families, good social organization, we can be emancipated from the struggle for existence. Moreover, Moses Harman has taught us how the race may be improved in mind and body from age to age without natural selection. Free motherhood will do the work of natural selection without exposing us to its pains; because the selection by women of the best fathers for their children, and the rejection of the worst, will be a conscious process precisely similar in its character to the unconscious process which has been for ages painfully elevating the race.

My Opinion and Walter Hurt's.

BY HOSEA M'COY.

The comment I made in Lucifer No. 753 on the arrest of Walter Hurt and the conviction of Charles Moore, I believe was as justifiable as the arrest of the one and the conviction of the other were unjustifiable. My full sympathy goes out to Walter Hurt because I regard his arrest as an outrage, and I cannot imagine how he could distort my language into the expression of a sneer. I am astonished that a man so merciless in his criticisms of others as Hurt is, should wince at my mild and kindly-meant criticism of his methods. As for his style of writing I offer no criticism, for that is a matter of taste and doubtless there are many who like his audacious and scintillant logodædaly. (I beg the pardon of Lucifer's readers for that Hurt-ian word, and I shall try to avoid any approach to lexiphanicism in the rest of this article). His style is pungent and bracing, but a "Gatling Gun" should be handled by a gunner with a clear sight. I do not claim to "know it all," but I have my opinion and I shall give it to Walter Hurt. It may not benefit him, but it can do him no harm, and it ought, at least, to prove to him that I am in sympathy with him, rather than against him in his battle for freedom of speech.

Walter Hurt expresses surprise at my calling him a "champion of morality" and then pleads guilty (?) to the charge. Not to go into a long argument, it is sufficient to say that I meant "conventional morality." According to Walter's definition of morality, every honest man is a champion of morality, for morality is merely a matter of opinion, the general idea being that it is that course of conduct which best promotes the welfare of humanity, or is least in conflict with it. Now on that platform Walter Hurt, Charles C. Moore, Charles H. Parkhurst and Anthony Comstock can stand together. So far as the definition goes their platforms are identical, yet their views as to what is for the best interest of humanity (society) are so divergent that Comstock and Parkhurst regard Hurt and Moore to be dangerous to the community and Hurt and Moore regard men of the Comstock-Parkhurst ilk as enemies of intellectual freedom and human progress—or, in other words, as immoral. So, for that reason, I say "It is the irony of fate that both these champions of morality should be arrested on charges of immorality."

I am aware that Hurt and Comstock do not agree as to what obscenity is. But I am also well aware from the writings of both that they consider it the province of the moralist to interfere with others who dare conduct themselves in a manner not in accord with the views of Hurt (in one case) or Comstock (in the other) as to what is for the best interest of society.

Now I believe Hurt might accomplish much good if he would take for his motto "The fullest liberty which does not invade the liberty of another"; if he would get down nearer to nature and learn from nature the rightfulness and wrongfulness of things, instead of sticking to conventional definitions which manacle liberty and stifle progress. For instance, in the April number of his paper he says: "It seems that almost no great, or distinguished, man of the past was too pure—if 'pure' and not 'cold' is the right word—to experience any improper yearnings." The context shows that by the use of the word "improper" he means sexual. He calls Moore a "blasphemous old brute", but could anything be more blasphemous than for a man of intelligence to call sexual desire an "improper yearning"? Such a desire can be improper only when it is accompanied by an inclination to invade an unwilling person in order to gratify it.

Further along in the same article, which Hurt in a foot note says is "written especially for the ladies," he speaks of sexual desire as "that scarlet force which, more than any other, determines the destiny of every human being." The word "scarlet" imputes shamefulness to the very act which brought Walter Hurt into existence. I do not accuse him of "sneering" at his own conception; it is merely the blind gunner shooting at random and taking inadvertently for a target that very basis of life which was worshiped by his and my ancestors as the most sacred principle of nature.

Even as I write the Christian churches are on the verge of celebrating the heathen day sacred to the goddess Eastre (Easter) who represented the fecundity of nature. The Christians have borrowed the feast from the old sun worshipers who held full moon after the vernal equinox to celebrate the return of the sun to revive the earth and make it fruitful. And Walter Hurt speaks of that great life-giving principle sneeringly as that "scarlet force." Fie! my friend; if you are not careful you will convict yourself of obscenity. And yet a few lines further along he says his intent is to "generate in the reader the moral breadth which is the ethical balance wheel of the Gatling Gun." A little less "moral breadth," methinks, would prevent the Gatling from scattering its shot against things the gunner would spare if his eyes were not blinded by the vail of conventionality.

An example of Walter's inclination to meddle with the affairs of other persons which do not in any way concern him is afforded by his confession on the second page of his paper for April. He tells of playing the spy on a preacher whose wife and daughters were out of town for the summer; of following him into a "beer-buttressed vaudeville show." And he adds "I went purely under a Parkhurstian impulse—that's the way I always go." This from a man whose arrest on a charge of obscenity was also the result of a "purely Parkhurstian impulse"—such arrests always are!

It is no defense to claim that the preacher was a hypocrite and had no business there; that is a matter for the preacher to decide. He says: "Of course I do not insist that he had any improper intentions . . but how does it look?" I don't insist that Walter had any improper intention in playing the spy "purely under a Parkhurstian impulse," but how does it look?

Then he talks of the "lop sided arguments" used by a man whose "wife is out of town" and gives this as a sample: "Nature is the court of ultimate appeal, and it is really sinful to balk her in anything." Perhaps he thinks that is my argument, but it isn't. I admit it is lopsided, because it is impossible to "balk" nature. Nature is too all-pervasive for that. It takes almost as much force to carry water down hill as it does to carry it uphill and the muscular exertion or the force in one case is just as natural as in the other. He continues "It is merely improper to violate convention"—that is a matter of opinion—"It is a crime to violate nature." Rubbish! It is an impossibility. Then he asks "Can't you smell the breath of Asmodeus in this?" No, but I hear the prattle of the nursery.

"Whether a man becomes truant or not always depends largely upon the character of his wife," he says, and adds "an incense breathing Florimel will raise a professional debauchee to respectability." Don't you believe it, my innocent friend. So many proofs of the falsity of these assertions exist, doubtless among your own acquaintances, that it is unnecessary for me to attempt to cite any examples.

I will not follow this further. I know Walter is guided by his own opinion, as I am by mine. I would not be unjust to him and accuse him of wilfully trying to injure a fellow human, but I do think he does not make sufficient allowance for the opinions of others when he assails them for conduct of which they, and not he, should be the judge as to its propriety. If he will confine his shots to targets which seek to restrain the liberty of non-invasive speech and action, he will have my heartiest approval.

As special targets for the "Gatling Gun" I suggest the people referred to in the following paragraph taken from an article translated from "Les Droits de l'Homme" by Benjamin R. Tucker, and published in the March issue of "Liberty:"

"Through all the changes that the world has undergone one thing has remained changeless—the hypocritical horde of the knights of virtue, provokers of murder and pillage, who, always under the same pretexts, always by the same calumnies, urge on an entire people to the remunerative exterminatoin of a defenceless minority."

Catherine the Great.

BY C. L. JAMES.

I am indebted to Dora F. Kerr for urging me to do what I have long meditated but delayed attempting, partly because I appreciate the claims on Lucifer's space. That is, to vindicate the greatness of some ancient women, all of whom were exempt from sexual superstition, if not sexual slavery. I cheerfully begin with Catherine I., because I always thought her the most indisputable example of a self-made, original female genius—also because by the world's standard, she was "naughty."

She was born a pauper and a bastard in the Swedish part of what is now European Russia, and was "brought up out of charity" by a Lutheran clergyman, who did not think it necessary she should be taught to read. So far as I can judge from appearance there was nothing either Scandinavian or Turanian in her blood. Her towering forehead, her very large black eyes, her rather handsome, though over-sized features, profoundly marked by a mixture of intellect, sensuality and melancholy, and surrounded by a luxuriant profusion of black curling tresses, all appear entirely Slavonic.

She was married early to a Swedish soldier, who, almost immediately afterwards fell fighting against the Russians. Catherine became the captive and mistress of a Muscovite officer, and when he had dropped her, was passed from hand to hand, until the Czar Peter the Great, who had lately assumed command in person, picked her up.

This prodigious rise was only the beginning of greatness, for which she was indebted solely to her brains. The Czar led his army across the Pruth into Moldavia and imprudently marched southward, to a place where the river could not be crossed. A superior Turkish force cut him off from his base, and the Russians were fairly in a trap. The officers could suggest nothing, the soldiers were demoralized, and the despair of the women, who were much too numerous, completed the irreparable disorder of the army. Catherine alone retained her presence of mind. She took her jewels to the Turkish camp, and bribed the vizier to accept a convention, which enabled Peter to retreat on the strength of some unsecured promises. The Czar came home defeated and ashamed. Every eye was fixed, not on him, but on the woman who saved his army and his country. Without doubt her scheme was very simple and obvious. So was Columbus' plan of reaching the West Indies by sailing west; and so was his way of making an egg stand on end. But similarly, only the original person thought of it. The Czar, who had privately married his mistress, soon found he would be approved in acknowledging the marriage. According to the laws of the Greek church she was rebaptized Catherine. Her name previously had been Martha. The vizier was promptly put to death for betraying his country. He must have foreseen the probability. By what blandishments his prudence was overcome, is not recorded.

The great Czar and Czarina were not born for domestic peace. Both had genius, but both were uneducated, intemperate, licentious, obstinate and self-willed. There was a tremendous storm when Catherine was detected in an amour. Having learned that she would not be put to death, but her paramour would, she had the magnanimity to intercede for him. Foaming with fury, Peter smashed a huge mirror imported at great cost, and roared to her:

"Thus can I destroy the chief ornament of my palace!"

"Well, Peter," replied Catherine, who perfectly understood, "do you think you have improved your palace?"

His fury was disarmed, but his resolution was inflexible. He made her ride with him several times round the stake on which his rival's head was fixed and watched her closely during the ordeal. She made no attempt to conceal her disapprobation; and it was equally clear her heart had not been broken by the loss.

Peter had paid the penalty of genius in soaring to an intellectual region whither no friend or confidant could follow. He found what he wanted—a comprehending kindred spirit—in Catherine alone. After all these domestic tempests he died in her arms; and it was to this woman—foreigner, slave, prostitute, drunkard, and one who could not read, that he bequeathed his empire, with the responsibility of carrying out his gigantic plans. Her private morals were not at all improved by sovereignty; her ignorance sometimes caused her to be imposed upon, and she probably died of drink, but her short reign decided this, that Russia would not again relapse into the barbarism from which Peter had raised it.

When I consider the depths whence she rose unassisted, and her discretion at the dizzy elevation she attained, I think it preposterous to compare her with Catherine II., who was born royal, educated as a princess and married as the queen of a civilized country, who left the government to unworthy favorites, shrank from her one great scheme of abolishing serfdom, and died fighting against that regeneration of the human mind which, in her better days, she had done much to facilitate. It may be allowed she too, had some ability. So had Zenobia. I doubt if either possessed the transcendent gift of genius.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 507 CARROLL AVE., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, William Duff, 9 Carfin St., Glasgow Scotland.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE EDITOR felt rather better when last heard from, than he felt last week, but did not send a letter for Lucifer. We hope to have one next week. He is still in Florida.

ARE YOU one of the many who like to have radical ideas presented in story form? If so, "A Cityless and Countryless World" should appeal to you. The paper-bound edition is exhausted, but there remains a supply beautifully bound in red cloth, gold lettering, 450 pages, which we will send for $1 each, postage paid.

756 is the number of this issue of Lucifer. Will you please look at the number on the wrapper of your paper, and see if your subscription is in arrears? If it is, and you are unable to pay now, and yet want to continue to read Lucifer, can you not send us a card, saying you want Lucifer and will pay for it when you can? If you do not want it, please say so. If, however, you do want to continue taking the paper and are able to send in your subscription now, I hope you will do so. This is not a plea for "donations," but is to remind our readers that I have little time to spare in sending out statements, and those who do not wait to be reminded, do me a great favor, saving me time labor and postage.

"The Ballad of Reading Jail."*

The edition of this poem which B. R. Tucker has just published, is a beautiful work of art. It is printed on hand-made, antique paper, with deckel edges, and is bound in blue cloth with vellum back. It is printed on only one side of the paper, and is, altogether a very handsome book.

The poem contains more than six hundred lines, and holds the reader fascinated from beginning to end. The book was published in England about the time (I think) of Oscar Wilde's release from prison, but this is the only American edition. Extracts from the poem have been printed in Lucifer, and I will give the following few lines as a specimen of its style, though to be properly appreciated the poem should be read in its entirety:

"The vilest deeds like poison weeds
Bloom well in prison air;
It is only what is good in Man
That wastes and withers there:
Pale anguish keeps the heavy gate
And the Warden is Despair.

"For they starve the little frightened child
Till it weeps both night and day:
And they scourge the weak and flog the fool,
And gibe the old and gray,
And some grow mad, and all grow bad,
And none a word may say."

. . . . . .

"With midnight always in one's heart,
And twilight in one's cell,
We turn a crank, or tear the rope,
Each in his separate Hell,
And the silence is more awful far
Than the sound of a brazen bell."

In England when a convict is hanged, his friends cannot claim the body, but it is buried in the prison yard in a bed of quick-lime. Of the trooper, in whose memory the poem was written, Wilde says:

"For he has a pall, this wretched man,
Such a few men can claim,
Deep down below a prison yard,
Naked for greater shame,
He lies with fetters on each foot,
Wrapt in a sheet of flame.

"And all the while the burning lime
Eats flesh and bone away,
It eats the brittle bone by night,
And the soft flesh by day,
It eats the flesh and bone by turns,
But it eats the heart alway."

* * *

I do not think the author exaggerated the horror of prison life—and death. I had a few glimpses of it last year, through the permission of the Home Office.

"We turn a crank, or tear the rope—"

The convict is condemned to turn the crank of a wheel so many thousand revolutions a day—I forget how many. Nothing whatever is accomplished by this labor, no machinery is attached to it, the convict's back is strained, his hands calloused, and all for nothing. It is his "punishment."

To "tear the rope" is to pull into fragments tarred ropes—it is "oakum picking." The fibre cuts and tears the fingers—the fingers of the men I saw at work were sore, and their nails torn. The entire system impresses one with its terrible waste of energy. Think of keeping men at work on a tread-mill to grind corn for food! That is what they do at Leeds, and probably at other prisons.

In memory, I have an ineffaceable picture of the treadmill at Leeds—the men upon it, stepping up, up, yet always remaining in the same place, their hands on a rest, heads bowed down, and perspiration on their brows. From that room we passed across the yard, where the dead convicts lie in lime, with the ground level above them and only a little wooden stake at the head to mark the place. We saw two rings of convicts taking their exercise—around and around they walked, reminding me of the horses which used to turn the old-fashioned threshing-machine. How despondent, how utterly hopeless they seemed!

"In Debtor's Yard the stones are hard
And the dripping wall is high,
So it was there he took the air
Beneath the leaden sky,
And by each side a Warder walked,
For fear the man might die."

In England, imprisonment for debt has been abolished. If a man is unable (or unwilling) to pay his debts his creditors may prosecute him, and if he loses his case he is sent to prison, not for debt, but for "contempt of court!"

"The Claimants of the Purse."

The above is the title of an allegory in "Munsey's," which it is surprising to find in a conventional magazine.

The story is of a woman who, while walking along a road, found a new purse filled with coins of gold and silver. She was delighted with it and took it for her own, and freely spent its contents, only rarely putting a penny back. One day, when all the money was spent, she saw that the purse was ragged and torn, and so flung it into the dust at her feet and passed on her way.

Another woman, coming after her, saw the purse. Ragged and seemingly spoiled though it was, she admired it, and thought it must have originally been beautiful. So she picked it up and took it home and worked patiently repairing the damage, mending the silken web and burnishing the clasps until it seemed good as new.

"But still," we are told, "she did not show it to her friends nor boast of it—as the first woman had done when it was new—for fear some one would ask her where the purse had been found or sneer at her for treasuring what had been cast into the dust of the highway."

She put gold and silver into the empty purse, but as she spent money from it, each day she placed more coins in it, until one day she was astonished to find that it contained more than she had ever put in it.

The second woman became so proud of her purse that she would no longer conceal it, and one day the first woman, seeing it in her possession, was surprised at its appearance—so beautiful and so heavy—and she laid claim to it.

The second woman defended her right to its possession, and asked the first woman what claim she could have to the thing which she had discarded, and the reply was that it belonged to the one who had "found it first," and the people applauded and demanded that the second woman should give it up.

This she was forced to do. "But lo! as the latter seized it, and while all were gazing, it became empty of treasure and torn and tarnished and battered, even as it was when she had trampled upon it. The first woman cried out in anger, and the people comforted her with their sympathy, for they loved justice and they were indignant that the purse should not be possessed by its rightful owner, beautiful and well-filled with treasure as the other woman had caused it to be.

"For the purse which had been cast aside when empty was the heart of the first woman's husband, and the treasure which it held was love."

Epistolatory Fragments.

M. FLORENCE JOHNSON, Friend and Co-Worker: It is with pleasure I acknowledge the receipt of your entertaining letter. Was somewhat surprised to find the author a lady; but so much the better, for an interchange of ideas between the sexes, when carried on in a proper manner, is conducive of much good.

Your ideas in regard to free thought coincide with my own. There is no chance for argument as far as they relate to religion and religion's God. But I judge from the tone of your letter that you do not stop there, and as I am ignorant of the particular phase of free thought that you advocate, I write for more information.

I wish to state right here that I am a strong advocate of women's rights—they can't have too many rights. Women comprise the best half of the intelligence of the human race. Woman's person is her own, and cursed be he who invades her sacred rights. That today she is the slave of brutal passions cannot be denied; but the remedy—what is it, and how to be applied? . . .

The questions I wish to ask are these. Do you believe in the marriage system of the present? If not, how would you bring the sexes together to perpetuate the human race? These are bold questions, I will admit, but very necessary . . . . If what you say does not meet my approbation I will tell you so and give my reasons. . . . My opinion of love may not agree with yours, still a free expression of views may be a benefit to me.

I may not address you in a proper manner, as I cannot make out by your signature whether you are a Miss or Mrs.

Hoping to hear from you again, I remain,

Yours fraternally, WALTER BARTON.

WALTER BARTON, Dear Sir: . . . Why were you surprised to find the author of my letter a woman? You say, "Women comprise the best half of the intelligence of the human race," so if you were surprised to find the letter written by a woman, it must be that you considered it below the standard of the best half—hence a masculine production. I have never been able to discover a better half to intelligence or sex. Perhaps I am deficient in my ability to discern goodness.

In regard to the idea of a personal God, I think we agree. My particular phase of free thought is, freedom to think.

I wonder on what authority you use the word "sacred." That belongs in the same grave in which you buried your God. . . . Sacred and cursed are words belonging to the vocabulary of the God-worshipers. You say "Cursed be he," etc.; but who is to curse him—God? Well, "curse" is not quite so religious as "sacred."

"That today she [woman] is the slave of brutal passion cannot be contradicted. But the remedy—what is it, and how to be applied?" you ask. Suppose I tell you of a man who is unjustly imprisoned and ask you what is the remedy. What would you say? I imagine your answer would be, "Release him!" So I would say whenever woman is "the slave of brutal passion" she should be released.

How can you "apply" liberty? I fear applied liberty would not be liberty. There are millions of slaves to the Catholic church—what shall we do with them? Free them mentally from their religion. "What will you give them instead?" Freedom to think for themselves, and to express their thought in words and deeds. What have you in place of the God which the superstitious worship? Do you want some new doctrine, crystalized in a system, "applied" to your mind in place of the old? You know every priest will say you are likely to be a bad man without it. Have you ever known a person made bad by being freed from a bad thing? Just so surely as men and women are made better by the freedom to think and act in regard to religious questions, are they made better by freedom to think and act on all other questions. . .

How would I "bring the sexes together to perpetuate the human race?" you ask. Well, I don't think it my business to bring them together. If you and a woman want a child I would say you and she should decide how you would come together for that purpose.

If the instincts and love of humanity will not perpetuate the race it would better cease to exist.

It does not matter whether your idea of love agrees with mine or not. If we are both free, you will love the one whose ideas do agree with yours, and I will love the one who agrees with me. If free, each may live his own life and the result may be made known; then we can learn which is better. We all know the present system is far from satisfactory, so why not allow honest individuals to try their ideals and see if there would be improvement?

My proper address is M. Florence Johnson. It looks quite complete on an envelope. I hold to that address as it does not reveal my sexual experience or lack of it, any more than does a man's address. When I read "Mr. Walter Barton" I do not know whether you are married or not. I presume that you are not a youth, or you would be addressed as "Master Barton." "Miss" and "Mrs.," however, are supposed to tell whether the woman has ever been married or not, and I see no more reason for that than for knowing whether or not a man is married. I believe in equality. When "Master" means that a man is unmarried, and "Mr." that he is married, or when "Miss" means an immature girl and "Mrs." a mature woman, I may use the prefix. Do you not consider that fair?

You say, "An interchange of ideas between the sexes when carried on in a proper manner is conducive of much good." I am not quite sure what you think proper, but if this letter is improper, and you think better, I can write to your mother, wife, or sister and they may read to you what they think proper.

Sincerely yours, M. FLORENCE JOHNSON.

The Influence of the Radical Novel.

BY ADELINE CHAMPNEY.

"Hilda's Home" is not to be regarded from a literary standpoint; the preface frankly waives all claim to literary consideration and thus puts it outside the lines of literary criticism. Its value lies in another direction and the reader must meet it on its own ground. Passing over, therefore, all the technical points, and regarding it as a picture of what is and what might be, I consider it a valuable book for propaganda work.

The first part of the book, which portrays the present condition of married life, is more convincing than the last part, which is merely ideal, and rather arbitrary. Every girl is kindly provided with a lover, there are no cross attractions, no unequal attractions, no mistakes, and "everything is lovely." One wants to know what would happen if everything did not run quite so smoothly, for in real life, even among radicals, and in fairly free conditions, there are rough roads, and the path of free love does not always run smooth.

The writer seems to believe in affinities, perhaps in "counterparts," for she makes each maid find a lover who is to her the one, and though there are other loves, none of them at all reaches the plane of the one best beloved. This one lover seems to be the only one chosen as a father to her child when motherhood is sought by the woman, and all the women are represented as wanting at least one child. In all this there seems to be something quite arbitrary, and some of us are of the opinion that there would be diversities of attraction, that some loves, though ardent, would be but temporary, and that not all the women would desire children; nor would each woman necessarily desire the same father for all her children.

This is a minor point and is an objection only to those of us who believe that freedom would produce a greater diversity of attractions and relations. To many, even among free lovers, variety is unnatural and undesirable, and for this reason I consider the story of "Hilda's Home" to be better for propaganda work, especially among the timid, than would be a more radical book. The germs of freedom for all desired relations is there, and that the more extreme are not depicted is a positive advantage in trying to present our ideas to most conservatives.

Another valuable thing about "Hilda's Home" considered as an agent in propaganda work, is that it appeals to the emotions as well as to the reason. While man is a reasoning animal, he has not yet learned to subordinate his emotions to his reason, and when he meets any new ideas they come at once into collusion with his emotions before his reason has a chance to take action upon them. It the result is a shock, all further attempt to reach the reason is, for the time, useless. From this cause the finest reasoning on the subject of sex freedom often fails of effect, because the question is met and settled in advance by the emotions, the prejudices of past thinking.

To present a new idea in such a way as to appeal to the emotions first is a kind of flank movement, and often a very wise one. The reason will be willing to listen to excuses, and to search for justification of that which has enlisted the sympathy of the emotional nature. While the fancy is captive to a new experience, the heart beating quicker in sympathy with the delight of freedom, and the untrammeled play of the finer feelings—then, with the soul in mutiny against the old, narrow, slavish dogmas, if there is any "sweet reasonableness" in the mind, sound, just, impartial, sane argument will convince it.

It is just this that "Hilda's Home" is fitted to do. It appeals to both the mind and the heart, and in such a way as to enlist the emotions on the right side. It does not shock, more than is always unavoidable when arraigning old standards and institutions, and above all it presents the ideal of freedom in the sex relations in such a way as to emphasize the purity of the idea.

Purity is the whole atmosphere of the book. Hilda, Margaret, Imelda are pure women, and women whose purity is evident, even to the conservative mind. There is not a note that can be called licentious, voluptuous, even erotic; passion is always subordinate to affection and both to reason. In the portrayal of those whose lives are not attuned to this pure, free love, there is no suggestiveness, nothing coarse and yet they are made to appear in most disagreeable contrast to the free lovers of the story.

It is not ever so with those who advocate free love. There are some to whom freedom in the sex relations means excuse for coarseness, vulgarity, shamelessness. Sex is essentially pure. From this they argue that all mention of sex, anything connected with it, natural or unnatural is also pure. They think a "free" person must of necessity enjoy "smutty" stories, lewd jokes, any reference to sex relations whether it has any useful purpose or not. This is not the fault of the free love idea, nor are these really free people; they are just as fond of the smutty story before as after they embrace the free love platform; they delight in the forbidden topic—partly because it is forbidden—and the unwholesome attitude of mind thus developed may continue after they begin to gain a truer valuation of things.

This class does much to cast odium on the whole movement for sex freedom in the minds of the people as a whole. Seen through their representations and arguments, free love is not attractive to the pure-minded and the timid; it savors of the street-corner and saloon gossip and morality; the familiar handling of words long associated with mystery and with shame is revolting, and whatever of truth and of justice there may be in their arguments appeals to deaf ears. A flippant handling of such grave questions is never in place, and is an injury to the cause when used in presenting the subject to conservatives.

One who is trying to lead another out of the folds of Puritanism into the love of liberty, is often sore perplexed to choose from the literature on the subject. A book which may be wisely offered six months hence will not do at all now. An article which would shock today may be acceptable tomorrow when the way is prepared for it. Hence the "missionary" in this line will welcome "Hilda's Home," for it is a fine book to put in the hands of beginners in this thought. It may well prove an eye-opener to many, and not alone among the over cautious, the prudish, but among the opposite class, for I find it quite as difficult to present the true gospel of freedom to those whose life is one of indulgence in forbidden ways, as it is to those whose lives and thoughts are most Puritanical. Imelda found it quite a task to bring the light to Corn's superstition-ridden mind; in spite of her experience she was not much readier for the truth than was Imelda herself when Margaret first presented the new ideal to her.

Again, Lawrence Westcott was no more apt a pupil than was Norman Carlton, and it would have been useless to try to enlighten Tom Dixon. "A woman who does not believe in marriage—what would you?" From my own experience I set down as hopeless both the spinster who doesn't like to say "Father, because it is so suggestive," and the young male animal who thinks "It's naughty, but it's nice—and the naughtier, the nicer." Such a book as "Hilda's Home" would at least be a mystery to such, and to some a revelation.

I hope the book will have a wide circulation. I wish it could be read by every young man and every young woman in the land. We need to wield an influence over the ideals of the young and it is the books they read in their most impressionable years, as well as the opinions they hear, which form their ideals.

Early in the teens when the incipient manhood and womanhood is awakening and demanding recognition, the young person turns eagerly to novels, wherein he finds depicted the loves and passions which he is just beginning to find developing in his own nature. What does he find? What are the ideals then impressed upon him? Alas! they are of the "brood of lies" and these are they: Exclusive love, exclusive possession; Jealousy, the willing Slave; a woman never truly loves till she is mastered; Marriage, a Divine Institution; Divorce, eternal Disgrace; Once Lovers, forever bound; The Family, a Divine institution; Man, the owner of Wife and Child; Motherhood out of wedlock a sin and a shame;—you know them, the odious ideas which are sown in our young minds and often linger there even when we come into fuller light. How we despise them now! How we long to sweep them out of existence and end their falsehood-bearing and sorrow-breeding career! In all literature they are rampant, the dead and decaying superstition of a day that is past, an ignorance that is outgrown by the world's thinkers, but which still lies in wait to ensnare in its slimy folds the young, the aspiring, the growing minds of the leaders of the future.

We welcome "Hilda's Home," we give thanks and all honor to Rosa Graul, and we stand ready to welcome many more; we want to flood the world with sweet, pure, wholesome stories of love that knows no bondage, womanhood that knows no "thou shalt, and thou shalt not," manhood that seeks no possession, no mastery, and childhood that is loved and sought. The Ideal must precede the real. To renovate society we must remodel society ideals. Then shall we begin to see the light of a new day.

Coming Out.

BY ALBINA L. WASHBURN.

It is really encouraging to find so many people who have long been thinking, but dare not speak, now lending their voices to the advance movement. Courage to speak comes when they find others sharing their convictions. For my part, I have long practiced plain speaking not only for my own satisfaction, but for the very purpose of encouraging the weak and timid. Women especially, who have long been held back, need to cultivate their self-esteem and to be taught that the world needs their thought. It is their duty to utter the truth that is evolved for them only.

An intelligent woman near seventy, active and social, said to me, "I have long thought that it is all wrong for husband and wife to occupy even the same house much less the same bed A woman should be left entirely free and independent and relieved from the drudgery of washing, mending, feeding and caring for other than herself and children. I believe all would be happier if the visits of the husband were on a purely social and intellectual basis. Many a quarrel separating loving hearts has arisen out of the jarring of domestic or other matters quite foreign to their love for one another. They would preserve that love and their self-respect by living apart."

Another intelligent woman of eighty years remarked, after approving an article I read to her from Lucifer: "Yes, I said to a young man once—a young man to whom I felt free to speak—(he was just getting married). I said, 'John, for pity's sake when you get married don't be guilty of committing a rape on your wife. Remember that she belongs to herself and respect her and yourself enough to act accordingly.' Yes, indeed," pursued my friend, "many a young and sensitive wife, an innocent, ignorant girl—ignorant of men I mean, has has been shocked and disgusted on her marriage night so that she never could love or respect her husband again."

"And yet," I replied, "they go on suffering in silence, in the belief that separation and divorce are disgraceful and society holds them to their vow."

"Well, it don't, or at least it couldn't if they did but know it. But O, if they would before marriage only inform themselves of the rights of one another and how to live, it would be so much better."

A lawyer said yesterday, "I'd like to be appointed an assistant attorney down at that court on the west side. Do you know how they treat those prostitutes? They make a raid on Market street every little while, haul 'em up and fine 'em—yes, to get money—and, I 'spose you've heard, they tip the wink to the men, as they never get caught—O no! If I had authority I'd never fine 'em a cent, poor things. Society makes 'em and society ought to protect 'em. Damn society, anyhow!"

At our Social Democracy and co-operative gatherings I meet a mother and her two big boys, well-behaved and attentive. They all seem so glad when I give them a new copy of Lucifer.

"Do you go to school?" I asked.

"We go here, one of them replied with a smile; "we work when we get a job."

A man to whom I lent "Kasrezza," Dr. Stockham's invaluable work, said to me after reading it:

"If we'd had that book forty years ago we might have led better lives and been a deal happier."

I also supplied the family table with Lucifer every week and found it appreciated.

"But," said a dear woman friend after reading "The Awful Life of a Lawful Wife" in a recent number of Lucifer, "what will become of the children of these free lovers or whatever they are? I think," she continued, "that they ought to be married and the father ought to support them."

Then I told that sweet, benighted soul that many a married father did not support his children; that he often deserted his wife, and if he did not the wife had to earn enough to keep all, himself included; that we read not only of the sailor who had a "sweetheart in every port" but of men who had a wife in every state; so that looking at the question from that standpoint, marriage was not the ideal condition we would fain believe. Children are looked after somehow or they are abused or neglected without, so far as we can see, any reference to the marriage of their parents, so that what becomes of the children is really a question by itself.

Doubtless men and women are happier and nobler together provided they have the elements of harmony and nobility in their characters; so children fare much better reared in congenial homes where everything needful to their best growth (including genuine love) is supplied.

They should be taught to love as well as to dance, but we must admit that sometimes children fare better at the hands of others than with their parents. We all owe a duty to the young for their sakes and for our own. It used to be much the fashion to pity children who had a step-mother. We have learned to think and to observe that often children gain not only in physical care and moral training, but in mother love by the removal of an own mother and the substitution of a stepmother. The qualifications needed for any position in life inhere in the the person and not in the law; hence a loving woman of good sense may profitably supplant a careless, brutal or ignorant woman who has happened—mind I say happened—to give birth to beings who need the ministrations of her successor and would be ruined by her own. Let us learn to look at things squarely in the face and to judge clearly each fact by itself.

Forced to Love

BY JAY CHAAPEL.

Walking one sunny day last September in the country near the magnificent Maine woods, I met a little boy leading a big, yellow, hybrid looking dog, by a dirty knotted string. I said to him as I patted his head,

"I suppose you love that dog and the dog loves you in return?"

With a gracious smile and dignified air he replied:

"You bet he loves me; he knows very well if he didn't I would knock the stuffing out of him!"

That is just about the situation of things with this land boasting of freedom and the Filipinos.

Fashion Notes for Men

[The following is especially commended to the attention of those who think Lucifer a "one-ideaed, woman's paper." The notes were written by Ana Perkin, a woman who dresses in coats and trousers]:

The trousers this spring are flared at the bottom. One or two stiff rattan hoops are run in the bottom to keep their shape. They are faced with pink silk.

The new frock coat reaches to the knee. It is lined with pink silk. The bottom of the coat is finished with a black satin ruffle, slightly full. The sleeves are flared at the top, slightly puffed at the shoulder, and finished at the wrist with six buttons and a little black satin bow at the top.

The vest is cut very low and laced across with gold cord.

Two large roses, a red and a white, are worn at the left side of the silk hat.

The hair is parted in the middle and held in place by gentlemen's side-combs.

The watch is worn outside the vest, fastened at the pocket seam with a large ornamental pin. The watch charm is a gold donkey.

The gentleman of fashion may now sally forth, knowing that he is properly and elegantly arrayed.

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

Subscribed for in Advance.

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

At last we have a cheap and good American edition of this incomparable creation of the Astronomer-Poet of Persia, as rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Once read, "The Rubaiyat" is read again and again and each time with new insight and delight.

It is the wish of Swinburne that the rich gift of Omar Khayyam of Naishapur may "be tasted in that most exquisite English translation, sovereignly faultless in form and color of verse, which gives to those ignorant of the East a relish of the treasure and a delight in the beauty of its wisdom." With sketch of Omar's life. Symbolical cover. Price 10 cents. Address Edwin C. Walker, 244 W. 143d Street, New York City.

THE BALLAD OF READING JAIL. BY C. 3.3.

This powerful poem of more than 600 lines, is the work of OSCAR WILDE. C.3.3 having been the poet's prison number during his confinement in Reading Jail. It is dedicated to the memory of a trooper of the Horse Guards who was hanged in the jail at that time, and it depicts the terrible sensations of the author and his fellow prisoners before and after the execution.

Just issued; price, in cloth, blue, vellum back beautifully printed from large type on hand-made antique paper, deckle edges; reading matter on one side of the paper; a sumptuous book of 96 pages, 7 inches by 5. $1. In paper, 44 pages, 10 cents. Mailed postpaid on receipt of price, by E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d St., New York City.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 368 pages. Price 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN

IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Nayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 286 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Ideala was a woman too thoughtful, too honest, too true for the conventional "middle class" English society in which she lived. Her life story furnishes much food for thought for those who like to study the facts of life when disguised as fiction. 196 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth, with silver lettering. Price, postpaid, 25 cents.

HUMAN RIGHTS: By J. Madison Hook. With an introduction by E. C. Walker. "Liberty is the guiding star of all lands, all races." Chapter I., Rights; Chapter II., Invasion; Chapter III., Co-operation; Chapter V., Individualism; Chapter V., Liberty. Price, ten cts.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Hear all sides, then decide." 23 chapters; 478 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eye-witnesses, the threats of mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.27, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

Contains matter pertaining to the Legitimation League and the Personal Rights Association of England. Also, four fine full page portraits of Mrs. H. Heywood, Moses Harman, Lillian Harman and Lois Waisbrooker, together with sketches of their personalities and work. By Oswald Dawson. Neatly bound in boards. Price, 20 cents. Address Moses Harman, 807 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

Personal. An intelligent woman, of non-conventional but not accepting fully doctrines of Lucifer, who would appreciate comradeship and more light, is willing to correspond with gentlemen. Address "Isaiah," this office.

Wanted: A capable woman to manage and help with the housework in small family. J. C., Box 59, Oakland, Ill.

Personal I would like to become acquainted with the friends of freedom living in Minneapolis, St. Paul and vicinity, and especially of women believing in Ruedebusch's "New Ideal." Please address M. N., 807 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

"THE EAGLE AND THE SERPENT" teaches that the people must save themselves by their own pride, their own wit and their own daring or be forever damned. "The great are great only because we are on our knees. Let us rise." Editor, E. McGill, 185 Fleet street, E. C., London, Eng. We will forward samples at half price, five cents.

Love Must Be Won.

Love is not free to take, like sun and air.
Nor given away for naught to any one.
It is no common right for men to share—
Like all things precious it is sought and won.

So if another is more loved than you,
Say not, "It is unjust," but say, "if she
Has earned more love than I, it is her due,
Were I deserve more it will come to me."

But if your longing be for love indeed,
I'll teach you how to win it, a sure way:
Love and be lovely, that is all you need
And what you wish for will be yours some day.

—SARAH Coolidge.

Some Trials Incident to Transition.

MY DEAR HELEN: Is not Edith's experience causing you, both of you, too much chagrin? Do not think so much of it until you have had time to get a better perspective. You will be able to laugh at it by and by instead of being full of indignation.

But the first keen sense of the situation is depressing and almost disheartening—although, perhaps, no word with "heart" in it should be used in this connection.

Ask Edith what has become of her cheery, ever-ready "never mind; don't you care." The entire episode meant only that Adolph was in what Edward Carpenter would call a "passing sex-spell," and when he offered her love it had no particular reference to her but only to "some one, anyone." She ought not to feel too personally insulted. Adolph is not the only man into whose mind has never yet entered that a woman may be free to love and yet may not love him. Edith must take it as one of the minor points of a liberal education which no one can afford to go without.

I know how Edith feels. "The quality of mercy is not strained," but I sometimes fear that the quality of love is becoming so. In this transitional age, perhaps love's attitude is—occasionally—ludicrously like that of Doss, one paw up and one down, uncertain whether to go or stay, to be or not to be, and what to be or not to be. In this uncertainty there is a good deal labelled "love" that seems to be a combination of benevolence, a dull interest, a half-perception of the requisite number of admirable traits—the "yes, I think you will do" variety. The product bears about the same relation to heart-love that a fashionable "at home" evening does to the communion of souls.

But free love theories can hardly be held responsible for men like Adolph. If he had never heard of love apart from marriage his feeling would have been of the same essence. Shaw's characterization, "The humdrum fondness of the bourgeois Jack for his Jill" is excellent. Love never rises above the high water mark of the lover.

You said that you sometimes felt as if radicalism never made a day's more happiness for anyone. But that isn't what we have to expect of it now. If radicalism means new discovery of truth it must make for happiness sometime—but at present it is in the making. "I came not to bring peace on earth, but a sword." We are perhaps—probably—worse off in a good many ways than those to whom the old creed is still enough. We are no longer fitted to the old, and the new is not yet here. This is the time of storm and stress. New ideas only put us out of touch with the old life and the old life has still possession. There is no unity, and there can be no unity, about our own lives while all else is still of the old.

A bicycle is made to be ridden, not to stand alone. The rider not being at hand, nor anything else, it will tip over ridiculously and ingloriously. And we have no right to expect any other feats of new men living in an old world.

I will confess that I have often felt—just as your indignation about Adolph is making you feel at this moment—that the radicals were a poor lot. But I remember that before I was one, I used to see people behaving in a way which made me say, "We're all poor critters." New ideas do not affect temperment or tenderness. Nor do they at once remodel character. And yet ultimately new thought will effect everything, will reconstruct everything.

It ought to be remembered that to strike out in an entirely new line requires a certain kind of force in a character—possibly even an aggressive forcefulness—and perhaps that is incompatible with the easily graceful and beautiful qualities which we would enjoy finding in people. And then you know, it is like this: The pioneers of the world always have to do the world's rough work. It is not fair to demand that their hands be always soft and pleasant.

Mrs. Stetson says that some time, "women will make better men." I intend to quote her exactly, but the book is not at hand. Better men will be made better when the conditions of life are better, when freedom is, and life in freedom. But more goes to the making of fine men than any woman's will and intention. For a long time yet, some very heroic women will make some very worthless men.

And it is to me quite incomprehensible that a woman can seriously believe it possible now, or that it can ever be possible, for a woman to be educated into reading character so discerningly that she will be secured against mistake in her choice of a lover. I say "lover," although Mrs. Stetson is speaking of husband. I often think of the Frenchman who replied to his daughter's remonstrance against marrying a man whom she hardly knew at all: "That is not at all necessary, my dear; you will know him better in a week after marriage than in a year before." That is not all, either. One may live with a man many years and know him not at all. Knowledge of character is a faculty which only experience—long experience—of life, develops. Education can do nothing directly in this, although a false education may mislead.

I have not said that a certain quality of happiness was never found in a communal home. I am only convinced that such an arrangement is fatal to the growth of individual strength.

What is really needed to be perceived is that, other things being equal, the communal household is ruled by whoever in it has the kind of strength we call self-assertion, and often by the kind of self-assertion that comes from a deadness of feeling where others are concerned. The woman is not always subjugated in the home of today; sometimes the man is. GIOTTO.

The New Marriage Law of North Dakota.

"Be it enacted. . . The probate judge in each county shall appoint a board, consisting of three reputable physicians, one of whom shall be a female physician where practicable; if there are not that number of physicians in any county, the board shall consist of two, but if three are appointed, not more than two shall be of the same school of medicine where avoidable.

"It shall be the duty of this board to pass upon the application of all persons for licenses to marry, and no license shall be issued to persons contemplating matrimony unless they shall receive from the board of physicians appointed a certificate setting forth that the applicants are free from the following diseases, any one of which shall be deemed sufficient cause for refusing a license to marry: Dipsomania, true insanity, hereditary insanity, primary, secondary or tertiary syphilis, hereditary tuberculosis or consumption.

"The examining physicians may be removed for cause by the State Board of Medical Examiners and shall be removed for inefficiency or neglect of duty, or when complaint is made by any applicants for a marriage license whose complaint is sustained by a majority vote of the board. Applicants for license to marry shall pay a fee of $2.50, for examination, and out of these fees the members of the examining board are paid their salaries."

The author of the bill, State Senator H. M. Creel, said that the bill passed the senate after being considered by the Judiciary Committee at Bismarck, N. D., March 1, 1899. This is another bill against the rights of the people, and is a great big African in the medical wood-pile! Why did Mr. Creel not include in his list vaccination, which has been proved to cause both syphilis and consumption? I do not usually take a pious streak, but this time I will quote from a syposiumm given in the New York "World" by several Divines, showing the trend of progressive thought:

Rev. Heber Newton: "The church and clergy have been derelict. They have not taught the people the responsibility of marriage. I would not like to see such law adopted in many states at present. A beginning must be made somewhere, if we are ever to have a rational and sane dealing with the social problems."

Rev. Rainsford: "The impression seems to prevail among a great many people that (more) law is a cure for every evil. I entirely disapprove of this rushing into legislation for all kinds of purposes, and I do not believe such a bill as this will be of any value and is unworthy of further discussion."

Rev. Dr. Dix shows the ear-marks of the churchite. He says: "The legislature should not traverse the laws of the church." Taking for granted every church law is perfect. O, my!

Rev. Ducey: "In the Catholic church marriage is a holy sacrament. It is certain that the normal instincts of nature cannot be restrained by man-made laws."

This is one of the very best of reasons why all priests should marry, but the edict of the church is against it, though it is seldom a priest will tell so much truth all at once as this Rev. Ducey. He says further:

"It cannot be predicted with certainty that children of diseased parents shall be themselves diseased. I could not contemplate with equanimity the ruin of so many lives which might be productive of good. The law is defective and cannot be enforced."

Last but not least the divine (?) Ingersoll says:

"In my judgment science will not only increase sentiment, but sense also. Men are influenced according to their capacity, their temperament, their knowledge. Sentiment can never be destroyed and love will forever rule the human race. I have not much confidence in law—in law that I know cannot be carried out. The poor, the sickly, the diseased, the degraded, the crazed, as long as they are ignorant, will marry and fill the world with wretchedness and want. Let us have more science and more sentiment, more knowledge and more conscience, more liberty and more love."

Is it not one of the enigmas of the times that this "World" paper never once asked the opinion of the mothers or women upon so all-important a law? It sends straight way to the eminent he-male men—ministers who have always ordered the making and obedience to all such august legislative laws where women are most concerned, but never once allow them a voice in the legislative halls. "Wimmin is queer things." They much rather follow after some sky-pilot than to pilot themselves through the earth and heaven too, if they should be so unfortunate as to go to a Christian's Heaven. Really, I think I'm not so very pious after all, but I am yours for justice,

FLORA W. FOX.

Brief Notes.

BY C. L. JAMES.

Naturally the Lake Bay Colony being founded on liberty, succeeds better than Liberal, Sinaloa and all other communities founded on authority. But has it vigor enough to fight the persecution which will surely come when its neighbors find out that anarchists and free lovers have the gall to succeed? If so, it is the nonpareil. If not, its members would be better employed is a city, converting the world to anarchism.

I am afraid Romulus was born too late to be up in his Malthus. If economic independence builds up new and happy homes like nests of free birds in spring they will soon destroy economic independence. But economic independence won't build them. Homes are playing out; restaurants, bakers' cooking, private peoples' dinners, laundries, telephones, rus-in-urbe villages around all the great cities, and bonanza farms, mean co-operative housekeeping and new idealism ahead.

Harriet R. Oh, no, I didn't concede that government must be retained for the sake of convenience. Only that "tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered." As to public schools:

> Oh, if folks knew their own affairs
> As well as what are none of theirs;
> If Jack could do the chores of Jack
> As Tom does his behind his back,
> And Tom could do but Tom's as well
> As Jack the way to Tom can tell;
> The work would doubtless be well done,
> But how could Jack and Tom have fun?
> Since both love bossing more than biz,
> Their work is cramped the way it is,
> While Jack and Tom elect a boss;
> They like it—never mind the loss.

I mustn't find fault with Comrade Beeson since he agrees with me about what chivalry means. But I will give him the information, unwelcome, I am afraid, that I have written a reply to Kerr, which perhaps Lucifer intends to print, and of which the gist was that chivalry, according to his own definition, is not the destined emancipation of woman—that she is becoming free not because men revere her weakness, but because she is stronger socially and financially than she was. Surely this is something to the point. It seems rough that before this reply to R. B. appeared I should also have Dora in my hair. Ten years ago, amidst the heart-searchings of the Chicago martyrdoms, I deliberately resolved to give all my time to the work of human emancipation, and stop trying to "get a living" except as I might pick one up along that road. I need hardly add that I have been several times as near starving and freezing to death as any average specimen of those whose burden I thus assumed. But I will inform Mr. Beeson that it has all along been my opinion, as it still is, that knowledge is necessary to emancipation and that I did well to cultivate it. True, there are different kinds of knowledge. I have seen recent proof that a man may do something for the emancipation of mankind though he does not know the difference between "patrician" and "partisan," or between "innovate" and "invade." But "wisdom is justified of all her children." A man of that kind could'nt do my work.

How and What Shall We Teach Our Children?

From "The Human Flower," by Ellis Ethelmer.

Doubtless the soundest and most unexceptional way to introduce the requisite physiological knowledge for children is by the teaching of its parallelism in simple botany; some of the incidents of animal and vegetable biology in the processes of generation being so closely analogous to us as to almost insensibly induce the reflection of the further truth in the young student's mind—at any rate, with very slight indication on the part of teacher or parent. . . Happily our false shame has scarcely reached the excess of considering any function of a flower impure, or improper for general observation and consideration. Indeed, our very emblem of purity is a flower; and that any idea or suggestion of impurity should attach to corresponding and equivalent human functions is due largely to that ill-advised excess of reticence, and groundless reprobation of innocent inquiry upon the subject.

* * * * *

But not all parents, however well-intentioned, have the technical knowledge required to meet and satisfy the questionings of the youthful intellect of this advancing day. And to parent or to child, school books or the generally accessible manuals of physiology are of no avail, for from them all mention of the generative organs and functions is usually excluded.

* * * * *

One of the most natural thoughts to occur to a child's mind is the question, "How did I come into existence? I know that I was 'born,' but what is 'being born'?" The thought may have suggested itself while one was still a small child; and would almost certainly be renewed by the arrival of a baby brother or sister or other relative. Then the information was perhaps sought from father or mother, whose reply—a judicious one—may have been, "It is a thing you will be able to understand better when you are older." But the pity is that, generally speaking, as the child does grow older, the awaited knowledge is not supplied. Too frequently the child has a silence and shamefacedness gradually forced upon itself in regard to thought or questioning upon the matter. And when, later on, the further growing observation as to difference of the sexes is aroused, the youthful inquirer may find that curiosity on that subject also is checked or met with evasion. This reticence on the part of those applied to may, however, have been largely due to their own lack of full information; since there has not been very clear knowledge and instruction on many of these points till within recent years.

* * * * *

Those of you who have thought upon the matter at all deeply will have reflected that not only are human beings born or reproduced—older ones dying off, and their places being filled by younger ones; themselves to disappear in due time, leaving successors in their turn—but a similar thing occurs with other animals, and with plants also. Thus you know that dogs and cats and horses may die, but that puppies and kittens and colts have been born, which grow up in their places; and if you have ever looked after a little garden of your own, you know that though your delicate-scented mignonette or your brilliant convolvuluses die at the approach of winter, yet the ripe seeds you have gathered from them will grow up into similar flowers if you sow them the next spring. Indeed, if the ground has not been disturbed, you may find similar plants growing again without your help; some of the seeds having fallen from the mother plants to the ground, and lain hid and dormant during the cold months, till the warmth and light of spring called them into full light and growth.

So far we may see how human beings and animals are some what at one with plants; but as we go farther on we shall find them still more alike in their nature and action, and you may be surprised to learn how very closely similar are the processes which have brought into life a little violet plant, and a little human baby that will perhaps be called by the same name as that sweet flower.

Crudities Criticised—No. 9.

BY FRANCIS BARRY.

There seems to be adaptation and harmony in nature, with a single exception. A vast amount of poetic aspiration has been developed, with very little poetic ability. The columns of reform journals, to say nothing of capacious waste-baskets, are in evidence. The very pretty poem of Jonathan Mayo Crane in Lucifer of Feb. 11 (No. 749) is an exception to the general rule. The poetry is good, the sentiment better.

Two able writers have taken considerable space to discuss chivalry. As two-thirds of the world's work is done by women, it seems that this masculine attribute, though possiby a beautiful and even magnificent ideal, does not exist as a matter of fact, to any great extent. But as woman's work is just as useful, and just as faithfully performed as that of her stronger and more assuming relative, it is difficult to discover where and how any great amount of chivalry is to come in. In case of parentage, the masculine parent, to be just, not to say decent, will furnish a full half of the care and providence, he will hardly be able to indulge largely in chivalry without sitting up too late for his good health.

It has been claimed (see Lucifer Feb. 18) that marriage "tends to limit the venereal contagion." As the world is nearly full of marriage, and as there is yet a fearful amount of sexual disease, the limiting business does not seem to have been a wonderful success. Marriage and sexual disease go together and will go out together. It has been often claimed that non-exclusive sexual relations develop sexual disease. It is not true. But it is true that free lovers will need to be select and judicious, and prudent and watchful to the last degree, or they will help to spread this constituent element of the marriage system. As yet there is more innocence than wisdom in freelovedom. Let wisdom "bear a hand" till the marriage abomination goes to the shades, then innocence can have its own way and be happy.

One of Lucifer's esteemed contributors, in giving an account of two lovers who were too honest and pure-minded to get married, calls them husband and wife. But there never was in the wide world, a wife who was not a married woman, or a husband who was not a married man. To use terms otherwise is to go contrary to the dictionary and general understanding Worse than this, by far, is to apply terms that pertain to the marriage system to relations that are innocent and commendable. Intelligent and well-meaning persons do nothing so pernicious as to engage in white-washing marriage. But no one who does it need feel lonesome, nor as especially criticised, for the "woods are full" of semi-radicals, who take time they had better devote to sleep, to ply this nefarious trade. Thirty years ago, in writing an article for the Stanton-Anthony paper, the "Revolution," in denunciation of the popular mistress system, I said incidentally, as I had been saying for fifteen years previous, that it was more honorable to be a mistress than to be a wife. The papers raised a hue and cry, and Mrs. Stanton, broad-minded and wisely brave woman that she was and is, came out with an elaborate editorial demonstrating that "Francis Barry is right." Lucifer's praiseworthy contributors should not be content to be thirty years behind the respectable radical—Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

Magistrate—"You are charged with beating a horse. What have you to say for yourself?"

Prisoner (sobbing)—"Why, yer worship, I've just lost me wife, yer worship."

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper 1845 has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

SEND MONEY by postoffice or express money orders or stamps. Do not send checks.

507 CARROLL AVE. is two blocks north of Lake street and one and one-half blocks east of Ashland Ave. Do not forget this when you are in the city. We are always glad to see our friends.

ONLY PERSONAL letters have been received from the editor this week. I quote the following from his latest letter, written at Pensacola:

"Reached this place at 11 last night (April 9). Did not feel strong enough to go on to New Orleans without stopping for rest and sleep. Stayed two nights and one day at Jacksonville, with A. and Ina Champney, and with A. J. Gardner of Kissimmee, Fla. . . Have considerable headache and some cough, but don't consider my symptoms alarming. Expect to go to New Orleans tonight—reaching there between 8 and 9 o'clock. I wrote you I had some copy ready, or nearly so. Expected to finish it and send it on today, but circumstances prevented. I saw No. 755 at Palatka and at Jacksonville. Some rather bad typographical errors, but on the whole a very good number, I think. Sometimes my meaning has been changed by typesetter. For instance in one of my letters I was made to say "on my trip this year," instead of "on my trip thus far." A very important difference—the inference being that I am in the habit of taking a vacation trip every year. I may not always write plainly, but I certainly try to make my letters plain enough for an average reader."

A Truth-Telling Judge Discovered in St. Louis.

"A man should have the right to slap a wife occasionally, but he should be very careful whose wife he slaps." This is the opinion of Judge Thomas H. Peabody of St. Louis, who discharged Bernard Kretzer, charged with wife beating. Just so. A man has a right to kick a dog occasionally, but he should be very careful whose dog it is he kicks. In either case, he should be sure that the property punished is his own. Otherwise the owner may sue him for damages. Of course neither the woman nor the dog has any right to object to their master's treatment of them.

It is evident that Mrs. Kretzer was laboring under the curious delusion (a delusion shared by many intelligent people) that there is a law to protect wives from physical violence, so she appealed to the court for such protection. The learned Judge soon set her right, however, rebuked her presumption, and dismissed the husband. We are not told whether her master gave her another "dressing down"—to use the elegant expression of the Judge—as a punishment for the inconvenience of his attendance at court. Probably she has learned the futility of making complaint if he did.

"When a woman takes a man for her husband," says Judge Peabody, "she does so knowing full well he is to be the ruler of the house."

Unfortunately, women do not know the blunt truth as stated by this Judge. The real facts are hidden by romance and illusion. I would like to see Judge Peabody's decision printed on every marriage license that is issued. He would thereby do more good than he could otherwise in a hundred ordinary lifetimes.

"And," continues our Judge, "he [the husband] shall have as much to say as she. Whenever there is a dispute between them and the husband's desire is a good one it should certainly be acceded to. If he is then provoked to undue anger I think he would be partly justified in striking her."

Who is to decide if the "husband's desire is a good one?" it may be asked. What a foolish question! Who but the husband should decide it? It is scarcely probable that a woman would oppose, at the risk of submitting to a "dressing down," a desire which she considers "good."

A marriage license is a license to indulge in "undue anger," it appears by this decision. If a man yields to impulses prompted by undue [sic] anger, when "provoked" by a woman not his wife, he is not usually excused therefor. It is well to make a note of the various passions to which marriage license gives free play. Such information should be especially useful to women contemplating marriage.

In this case the woman's offense was that she was "trying to counteract and thwart her husband's will in the presence of their children. It was setting a bad example, which he had a right to rebuke," we are informed by our legal guardian. Are we to infer that in striking their mother in their presence the father was setting a good example to the children?

"It would be a good thing to warn the women of the country that their husbands have the same rights that they have in the home and they should always be respected."

True, O mighty Judge! And I, in my weak way, will aid in sending forth this warning! If the man has the "same rights" that the woman has, does it follow that the woman has rights identical with those given the man?

Granted the rights claimed for the husband, is the wife to be excused for yielding to "undue anger" when provoked? If so, and if she should strike her husband, is it agreed that she would then be setting a good example to the children? If "same" does not mean "identity," "oneness," and therefore equality, what does it mean? As a matter of fact, this equality of rights is the kind enjoyed in many a home. And yet such homes are maintained for the benefit of the children! Is it a matter for surprise that there is so much hatred, strife and misery manifest in the world when the home is, as now, the hot-bed of these evils? Let us rejoice that "There is no place like home!"

What Can We Do for "Unfortunates?"

Under the department heading, "Various Voices," will be found a number of extracts from letters referring to "A Practical Question," which appeared in No. 752. I expected to take up the subject again before this time, but press of other matters has prevented.

In effect, the question was what could be done to aid women about to become mothers outside of marriage, and who, because of their false education, believe themselves thereby ruined. They are unfortunate, truly; but no more unfortunate than their married sisters who bear children when they are physically or financially unable to do so. A woman suffers enough under such circumstances without having added the horrors of social ostracism and disgrace, and loss of self-respect.

There are now in the cities plenty of places where a woman can remain during the periods of pregnancy and child birth, and from which places she can have her baby adopted, but these are available only for those women who can pay a price which is beyond the reach of the majority. So this thought occurred to me: It may be possible that in each state there are women who could and would take women who find it impossible to remain at home, and, either at a reasonable rate for board, or freely when circumstances rendered it necessary, give a home and considerate treatment to the dual life needing help.

As Lucifer has subscribers in every state in the union, I hoped a suggestion of this kind might meet the eyes of some of these women, and I gladly report that I have received responses from ten states. Kansas led with six answers, and other states have several to their credit.

Organization with the object of providing a large home has been suggested by several, but that is impracticable at present, I think. All that I expect to do at present is to record the names of those who are willing in any way to help, and then, when I learn of a women who needs such help I can put her in communication with those nearest her. I believe much good can be done in this way, at a cost of but little time or trouble.

Much could be said on this subject, but more important than words is earnest thought. If you deem it worthy of your consideration, will you not let me know what you think?

People of Bad Character Must Remain Married

If "Old Mizzoury" doesn't get her name in the papers it will not be fault of her judges and legislators. Here we have a bill which has just been introduced in the House at the instance of the State Bar Association, requiring that all decrees of divorce shall be provisional for one year, and only be made permanent upon proof that the person seeking the divorce is of good character.

Why it is that a person of bad character is presumed to be a desirable marital partner and parent, is perhaps clear to a Missouri lawyer, but I must confess that my brain is too sluggish to comprehend. If I believed in marriage (thanks to my lucky stars, I don't), and if I were married to a man of bad character (thanks to myself I am not), I should certainly be very grateful to him if he would get a divorce from me.

I wonder if this is the result of a deep-laid plot to give occupation to the lawyers and judges? Two people of bad character are not usually supposed to be the best stock from which to breed the coming generation. Yet this law would hold them together, for neither could obtain a divorce. And who, pray, is to decide what is "good character?"

Does Liberty Slay Love?

There is not so very much difference between the comments made by M. Florence Johnson and my own ideas. She admits the change in love, but thinks men and women will suffer equally. I think women will suffer more than men in adapting themselves to a love that means only a transient, evanescient, passional desire, dissolved as soon as expressed, after they have so long looked upon love as a steadfast, permanent anchorage.

Love, robbed of the elements of permanence, stability, constancy, its all-around mutual interests and co-operation in all departments of life, is something so different that the poets who sung of its faithfulness and constancy would not recognize it now.

My comparison was not between intellectual men and savages, but between the men who worship conventional gods and those who have thrown away all gods. The men who consider themselves progressive, free-minded, philosophical, who study biology and ologies "warious" are the ones who take the sincerity and sentiment out of love and have most to say about the "inferiority of woman." Not that all conventional men are good lovers and radicals are not, but a greater number of the latter regard love as a very light affair. It has no bearing on the serious concerns of life.

Men do not want to be taken seriously in love-making; they express a good deal of surprise and distress, or vexation when they discover that some foolish woman is suffering over an affair that should have been forgotten as soon as ended. Of course in many cases the thing is reversed and the man does the suffering, but not so frequently.

Love has triumphed over the dictum of church and state, has escaped through the prison bars of custom and Grundyism to be slain in the camp of the free lovers, its professed friends and rescuers.

The editor of Lucifer may accuse me of a "tendency to generalize from a limited individual experience," but I do not care now to defend myself from that.

I wish to state emphatically that I have no regrets or complaints or objections against any result of liberty. If love is robbed of the qualities we thought belonged to it by knowledge and analysis and investigation, let them go. We will not mourn over crumbling idols. If love is slain by liberty, still will I trust in liberty.

LILLIE D. WHITE.

I do not admit the change in love. Love is rare, and ever was so. The change is in our refusing to endure the hardships common to our ancestors. Formerly a woman bore many undesired children, and did the work of two or three women, and all because when a maiden, a youth told her he loved her. The liberal woman refuses to perform the "duties" of a wife and abandons the house when the lover changes to a legal owner, and the home becomes a workshop or prison. Our mothers expected nothing better, and the "good provider" need not be a lover. Indeed a caress given by a person after he or she had reached "middle age" was "spooney," "disgusting," "silly." That is the kind of home life that is going. There have been lovers. There are lovers, and the more intellectual, the better, more tender the lover. And as there has always been transient, evanescent love, there probably always will be. There have always been steadfast, true men and there always will be.

"My comparison was not between intellectual men and savages, but between the men who worship conventional gods and those who have thrown away all gods."

But if it is claimed that intellectual men do not love, we must go clear to the beginning and see if unintellectual men love better. Let us carry our reasoning to a logical conclusion.

The Sun Salutation.

"Melitta," in "Freiheit."

"Earth shall have spring again!" gleefully shouted the warm golden sunshine as he darted through ether waves.

"Earth shall have spring again; go proclaim it to the peoples pining in night and ice," was the message Mother Sun bade him deliver. But as he drew near the earth he grew pale at the sight of so much misery and privation. Gladly would he have returned at once, but just then two smiling innocent eyes met him and two child hands were wistfully extended toward him. In a basement tenement of a huge city a child of anguish had clutched a sunbeam.

Again the sunbeam sped away to the quarters of poverty, but here no one had time to notice him, and none cared to know aught about sun messages. Forth, therefore, he flew, until he came ro a large, cold, desolate house within which lay many invalids to whom no friendly hand ministered, for whom no heart beat either in hope or fear, poor forgotten ones who were here awaiting the end of a friendless existence.

There in one corner lay a woman with wild, distorted features. She had been despised and hated, for oh, cruel fate! love for her child had made her an unfortunate. Despised and hated, though dying, was the outcast still. Trembling, the sunbeam kissed the feverish brow of the sufferer, and a warm thrill permeated her. She thought of her love, the love that had caused her all this anguish and smiled blissfully.

In his narrow cell famished a captive, a workman—one of the best of men. He had fought bravely for freedom and light and had been condemned to night and death.

"A human being in a dungeon," thought our sunbeam. "Why dost thou tolerate it, O beneficent Nature, while fragrant flowers are free and warbling birds and babbling brooks?"

Then he shone into the heart of the lonely captive, down deep into a heart with a burning thirst for sunshine he beamed

"Springtime must yet come," thought the captive, "the springtime of liberty for which men have so hotly contended."

Further and further glided the bright messenger of spring

until he reached the silent city of the dead. He skipped by the tomb marked by splendid marble shaft or stately statue until he reached a mound with a plain memorial. Sacred is this spot, for the spirit of truth and liberty keeps vigil here. Here the exalted ideal, which outlives its originators and confessors, triumphs over death. Thousands stood around the graves of the heroes who fell in '48 in the struggle for freedom. They had dedicated countless wreaths to their noble predecessors—shoulder to shoulder they stood a mute, strong, proud host. An inviolable oath welled up in each heart, each felt the solemn compact though none spoke.

The day was declining, the sun sinking, yet once again flitted the sunbeam, radiant and blood-red, over the graves of those who fell in March. But those who lingered understood the blood-red sunbeam. Yes, springtime shall gladden the earth again.

The Question of the "Bed and Board."

Occasionally we see an advertisement to the effect that inas much as the advertiser's wife has left his "bed and board" he will be responsible for none of her debts. Sometimes, though not often, the wife "talks back," as in the following, taken from the Liberty, N. Y., "Register:"

"Whereas, my wife Helen, has left my bed and board without just cause or provocation, I forbid all persons from trusting her on my account, as I shall pay no debts of her contracting.

J. T. Tremper.

"And, whereas, that the said bed above mentioned belongs to me and is still in my possession; and whereas the said board was nothing to brag about anyway; and, whereas, such as it was it has left my husband and he it, and not I him; and, whereas, the only other board now running at large and unchallenged was a half-paid-for table, which has disappeared with the alleged provider and non-owner of the bed aforesaid; and, whereas, the aforesaid trust, as above said, was never operative; therefore, be it resolved that my husband never had any bed and but a very meagre amount of trust and not more than half a board to protect; and, be it resolved, furthermore, that he be allowed to hustle for new board, a place to lay his head, and such trust as God and man may see fit to endure; and, be it further and lastly, resolved, that undertakers are not barred on the aforesaid and lastly named trust.

Helen Tremper."

Three Good Rules.

If every one would read the following rules and then heed them, the world would be improved more than by all the sermons that ever were preached:

"If you are tempted to reveal
A tale someone to you has told
About another, let it pass,
Before you speak, three gates of gold.
Three narrow gates—first, 'Is it true?'
Then, 'Is it needful?' In your mind,
Give truthful answer, and the next
Is last and narrowest, 'Is it kind?'
And if to reach your lips at last
It passes through these gateways three,
Then you may tell the tale, nor fear
What the result of speech may be."

VARIOUS VOICES.

L. M. Bryan, New Florence, Mo.—I see our subscription has expired and send you fifty cents to extend our subscription and ten cents to help send out sample copies. I shall always be thankful to some one for sending me samples, and take this method of showing it. If I can cause one or two papers to fall in the right place and shed a few rays of sunshine I will consider myself well paid.

T. J. McPeron, Cheney, Wash.—Enclosed find $2, for which please send me one copy of "Hilda's Home" and credit me $1 on subscription. Wife and I think your paper is grand—we cannot very well get along without it. Hope the trip to the sunny south will greatly improve the health of the editor. While you of the east are having such unusual cold, we of this northwestern state are having sunny spring.

A. H. T., Mo.—I have thought that the desire you expressed in regard to these poor husbandless mothers (none the poorer for being husbandless, but from adverse sentiment) can only be realized by systematic organization or co-operation. When I read in last week's Lucifer of the "Free Discussion League" (and free discussion is one of the tenets of my creed that I feel sure of) I felt that I could not afford the seventy-five cents membership fee. But for this protection to prospective unmarried mothers I am willing to subscribe one dollar per year and more if my financial condition should improve to permit it. And I am a man, too. I don't know but your appeal was intended only for women.

Ed. Secrest, Randolph, Kan.—I see by my tag that my subscription has expired and therefore enclose one dollar for Lucifer another year. I have followed your father very closely since he left the icy north to seek a little rest and recreation in his old days in the balmy Southland. May he return from his trip refreshed and invigorated both bodily and mentally to again enter the arena of polemics, strap on sword and buckler and take up the fierce conflict with the enemies of right and truth. In his absence you have held the helm of an heretical editor with a firm hand, and the best interests of Lucifer have been well guarded. Individually however, I would prefer to see shorter articles, and I am just varietist enough to wish to see long articles divided and distributed through one or more successive numbers. This would give your admirable corps of correspondents a chance to be more often and briefly heard through our little paper.

S. E. M., Topeka, Kas.—I wanted to write you a good letter when you wrote the little short sketch of your father's life just after he started out on his trip. You don't know how much love I gave you for that little biography, for, as you said, we should not wait till he has passed from this plane of action before giving him the words of praise he so much deserves. In looking over the paper that came today, I find your words about the girl who is about to become a mother. I am one that would take such a girl in my home and give her all the love and respect and protection I could possibly give any prospective mother, and all the information I could also. If I were able, I would make it my business to take such women in and give them home and protection, but lack of means deprives me from doing many a good deed my heart prompts me to do. My associates are those of too good sense and understanding to make me or any one with me any trouble, or subject of remark, and any one in my care would be safe from the public.

Adeline Champney, 1421 Florida Ave., Jacksonville, Fla.—We are daily expecting to see your father again, but I hear he is detained at Lake Helen by an attack of biliousness, which we sincerely hope will have already passed away. On his first visit to Jacksonville he came to us with the blizzard. As his letters failed to reach us he gave us a surprise, and a most delightful one. We only regretted that we could not make him as comfortable as we should have liked to do. It has been my fortune to meet with disappointment in the personality of some whose writings I have liked, but in this case I am glad to find one whose presence is in harmony with the ideas one has formed from his work. I think you are a fortunate woman in having such a father, and I see from frequent words in Lucifer that you appreciate him. I think you are both fortunate in that you can give your minds to the work that most interests you, and that you need not be diverted by the bread and butter necessity, to the dull grind of labor for capitalists under this slave system.

Albina L. Washburn, 1336 Evans St., Denver, Col.—So glad our editor, rambling in search of health, is finding it. I enjoy his letters so much. I see one of your readers wants to let a room to a radical—it don't say where. If in Denver, would like to communicate. I want to help some radical a few hours in the morning at light housework for a good room where I can comfortably read and write and perhaps receive a few friends at times. I have thought of late we might start a small industrial colony right here in Denver (or any one might in a large city) by procuring a suitable rooming house where ten or a dozen of the lone workers now rooming about in various places, could ply their various trades co-operatively, having a common dining room and rooms for depository of surplus goods for exchange and parlor for evening meetings. I know several progressive, intellectual women who are ready to go into such an arrangement—but—there's the avaricious landlord who will have nothing but legal tender for pay, although there are six hundred kinds of money in use, all to buy labor. Can any Luciferite find us a co-operative house owner?

J. H. K., Mo.—Although you do not know me personally, and I have not heretofore written to you, I feel that I may address you as a friend, having been a constant and appreciative reader of Lucifer for a year. Am pleased with the conduct of Lucifer during the enforced absence of your father, and doubly glad that your ability to conduct the paper gives him the so much needed respite from care and worry, and do most earnestly hope his sojourn in the sunny southland may prove a genuine elixir of health and rejuvenation. Your mention, in a recent issue, of the girl who thought herself "ruined" elicited my sympathies, and I often wish that some asylum might be open somewhere where genuine sympathy and friendship might, without running the gauntlet of public approbation, be safely extended. Also the case of the woman in Los Angeles who yearns to be a mother again; when you know that a married man at fifty is childless, perhaps you may see how natural this feeling. I enclose copy of a somewhat free translation of a squib in the last issue of "Freiheit," John Most's paper. I thought it might be suited to Lucifer's columns. The name, "Mellitæ," I think is fictitious. Wishing you the best success.

E. S., San Jose, Cal.—The enclosed letter is from Mrs. J. W. D., my next door neighbor—just across the hall. She is old and I do all her corresponding. She began to read Lucifer (the copy you sent me is doing good work) through me, is poor, has a husband like many other men, and must be secretive as I am. We both have read "Helen Harlow's Vow"—found it in a private circulating library—and are anxious to read "Perfect Motherhood." I wish I could send you what we all need—money—I cannot now. Some day, God willing, the noblest advocate of woman's freedom shall find the bread cast upon the waters return. Do you ever receive short stories for publication? I find many women—beginners—will read a story, while the other articles are "too dry" they say. "Hilda's Home" is a masterpiece. I'd like to know the author or see her photograph.

[The question whether Lucifer should publish stories is one rather difficult to answer to the satisfaction of all our readers. The paper is so small that many grudge the space taken by fiction, while on the other hand, others have become interested in Lucifer through the ideas presented in a story. We have under consideration the manuscript of three serial stories, but whether they shall appear in Lucifer has not yet been decided].

Alamo.—When a few weeks ago, I expressed my conviction that monogamy in freedom was the best thing for all concerned I did not intend to express an opinion as to the "immorality" of variety, nor do I believe it to be immoral, but only unwise. Still it is unwise to live on a diet of fat pork and beans, but some of us have to do it. And so some of us to whom the one has never showed her face, on whom the eyes have never smiled, may be, in some lesser degree, attracted to some one and, with all reverence to her womanhood, give and get benefit, and be benefitted thereby. It is, for each, a case of "a half a loaf is better than no bread." And it need not be purely physical. Nevertheless, blessed is he that findeth his other half, for verily he shall be satisfied.

My remarks on free lovers who are disappointed because their wishes are not in every case gratified were not directed to "men about town," but men who profess to call themselves free lovers. The men about town I don't know, the free lovers I do. If you say that what I have said about them proves the falsity of their claim, I have only to reply that it is quite as just to put them down—or hold them up—as representing freedom, as it is to point to the man who cares nothing for the "Sermon on the Mount" in his life as representing Christianity.

John H. Mitchell, Cleveland, O.—I have just laid down the current number of a popular monthly with a renewal of the feeling that is strong within me that in spite of Comstock outrage and oppressive laws, that while in law the world, and especially the United States, is in darker depths than fifty years ago, yet the spirit of sexual liberty is advancing in the minds of all reading and thinking people faster than we readily conceive. When we read only the proceedings of courts we have come apparently to fear that we are drifting back to the days of the inquisition, and become almost discouraged. But when we read the thermometer of the modern thought—of the reading, thinking, reflecting men and women—then we may feel almost jubilant at the progress in the last quarter of a century towards the goal of perfect sexual freedom. These thoughts were renewed (not born) from reading a sketch on pages 972-973 of "Munsey's" for March, which I send you in another wrapper by this mail. When so conservative a magazine which caters to the Puritanical taste, admits an argument in vindication of the woman who exercises sexual freedom—even though gilded over with the language of parable—it is worthy of note. And "Munsey's" is following, not leading in the publication of sentiments that twenty-five years ago would have cost them the major portion of their circulation. There is light ahead.

L. C. C., Kansas.—The questions, "What do you think?", and "What can you do?" at the close of a very interesting article in Lucifer No. 752, kept me awake a good part of last night. At first I thought, I am poor, I can do nothing; then this thought was crowded out by others and I resolved to write you this morning, present some of those thoughts and leave you to determine their worth. I would like no better work than that you mentioned, no higher work than helping such girls to regain their self-respect, etc.; and like yourself, I have long dreamed of what I would like to do. But I have no money except what I earn, and I have two children and myself to support, but I have thought, Why can not the Lucifer women band together, as do the women of the church, and help this work along? First, let a home be established in some city, where people mind their own business, then let those girls be sent there and let our money, contributed a mite at a time, go toward keeping up expenses of the home. But I cannot drop this all-important subject with these indefinite plans. Here are others: I am an experienced nurse. I have cared for a great many mothers, and have excellent health, and so am able to care for many more. I am living in this place, but it is too small. I cannot get as much work as I want and can do, so I am thinking very seriously of moving to Kansas City, or some other place where I can get more work and better pay. If I succeed in going there I shall have my own rooms and no one to interfere with my plans, and I should like nothing better than taking such girls, doing the work of caring for them if there could be some means of meeting the expenses. This is what I think I can do. Do with it what you will. I am yours in the work of saving woman.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 30 cop ies per dozen.

Do You Want a Copy?

You have been looking long for the appearance of HILDA'S HOME in book form. The delay has been vexatious, and doubtless has taxed the patience of many who were charmed with the story when they read it in serial form in Lucifer. The edition printed was limited to one thousand copies, many of which were

So, in order to secure a copy, if you were not a paid-in-advance subscriber, you should send in your order at once, for many persons will want extra copies and soon the supply will be exhausted.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 435 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

The following by WILLIAM DENTON, pioneer Freethought and Spiritualist lecturer, and naturalist, who died while on a journey of scientific research in the wilds of Australia some fifteen years ago, are of as vital importance now as when they were written:

Sermons from Shakespeare's Text:
"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything."

Orthodoxy False, Since Spiritualism is True.
The God Proposed for Our National Constitution.
What is Right?
Man's True Saviors.
Christianity No Finality or Spiritualism Superior to Christianity.
Who are Christians?

RIGHTS OF WOMEN

IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayen" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 256 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Ideala was a woman too thoughtful, too honest, too true for the conventional "middle class" English society in which she lived. Her life story furnishes much food for thought for those who like to study the facts of life when disguised as fiction. 195 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth, with silver lettering. Price, postpaid, 25 cents.

HUMAN RIGHTS: By J. Madison Hook. With an introduction by E. C. Walker. "Liberty is the guiding star of all lands, all races." Chapter I., Rights; Chapter II., Invasion; Chapter III ,Co-operation; Chapter V., Individualism; Chapter V., Liberty. Price, ten cts.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Hear all sides, then decide." 22 chapters; 478 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eye-witnesses, the threats or mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.37, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This at the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and physical standpoint: A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution, its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 15. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, APRIL 22, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 758.

The "Question Mark."

We soar into the heavens
To learn about the stars:
We visit planets Jupiter,
And Venus, Saturn, Mars,
The light of knowledge seeking there,
But still we're in the dark;
And while we grope we bump our heads Against a—?

We turn the stony pages back
Of stern old Mother Earth;
And gaze on hidden treasures there,
And talk about their worth;
And graven midst the fossils, that
Repose there grim and stark,
Again we find, as plain as day,
A great big—?

In physics and in chemistry
'Tis ever just the same,
That things do so, instead of so,
The "why" we can't proclaim;
And when we gain a little light,
Alas! though but a spark,
'Tis quite enough to plainly show
That monstrous—?

At last we seek theology,
To study the Divine;
And after facts about the great
"I am" we seek and pine!
We read of "Jonah and the whale,"
And "Noah and his ark,"
And the "Atonement;" what we find
Is still a—?

France and the Social Question.

Ferdinand W. Peck, Commissioner General of the United States for the Paris Exposition of 1900, has reported that there will no special department for women in that big show. This has afforded a text for many American newspapers to expatiate on the backwardness of the countries of the eastern hemisphere in recognizing women as a factor in social and industrial progress. These newspapers mayhap are not acquainted with that pioneer work in the interest of women's emancipation, "A Vindication of the Rights of Woman," written by Mary Wollstoncraft, the mother of the wife of Shelley, England's most gifted poet of liberty. There are other old-world women writers of force and fame whom these newspaper writers may have forgotten, but, as the present day novelist would say, "Why continue the sad tale farther?"

That France, of all nations in Europe, is not blind to the importance of women as a factor in humanity's progress is proved by the recent publication in Paris of "La Revue de Morale Sociale," a quarterly magazine on lines quite similar to those of Lucifer and "Our New Humanity." The magazine starts out with an excellent initial number, and the articles it contains bear evidence that the study of sex problems in France is not a new thing. The magazine is printed in the French language, and for that reason comparatively few of Lucifer's readers would care to subscribe for it, but for those who do read French no more progressive publication on sex problems could be recommended. Following is a translation of the editorial salute of the magazine's first issue:

"Among the many questions which are asked today, as if addressed to a sphynx which overlooks the path along which the present generation is passing, there is scarcely one more important than the problem of the moral and social relations between the sexes. The reciprocal rights and duties of men and women, the obligations and prerogatives of one and the other in the family and in society: these are questions which are vital to society as a whole and to each one of its members. On their solution depends, in a great measure, the happiness or misery of individuals, the prosperity or the decay of nations, and the future of the human race.

"Yet it is difficult to find a domain so little explored and so greatly encumbered by prejudices of all kinds—a classic land of blind traditions and of hasty and ill-considered judgments. Observe the differing expressions of opinion, study the wording of the laws, consult contemporary literature, listen to the conversation, frivolous or serious, in the parlor or in the street—what a strange confusion of ideas, and what an absence of purposive direction! But always one fact is manifest to him who will permit himself without prejudice to give the matter any attention: that is the injustice of which woman is the victim—an injustice which permeates conventional customs and institutions.

"Whether in morals, in law, in school teaching, in political economy, or in sociology, are not things looked at always from the man's point of view exclusively?—as if woman, being of inferior essence and of merely contributory value, ought not to be taken into consideration until man has received his full dues. He is the end; she is the means. But more and more, on all sides today, the righteousness of such a system is contested. It is beginning to be perceived that this exclusiveness, to the detriment of one of the interested parties, is contrary to the nature of things and perilous to social order. A change of these conditions is approaching.

"Besides, it is coming to be understood that, instead of raising altar against altar and appealing to the antagonism of the sexes, it is better to work together in a spirit of harmony and broad solidarity, not only for the profit of woman, whose rights and interests should not be considered different from those of man, but for the great good of society as a whole.

"There being no magazine especially devoted to the consideration of these questions in existence today, it appears to us that the hour has come to attempt such an enterprise; and we present you 'The Review of Social Morals,' (La Revue de Morale Sociale) for which we solicit your good will and sympathy.

"In the interest of science and reform this 'Review' will have for its object the critical study of all that pertains to the social and moral relations of the sexes; besides, it will endeavor to discover the best practical solutions for these problems and will announce them as clearly and as precisely as possible. Among the many propositions for reform in this domain, which are becoming more and more numerous, our aim shall be to create a center around which the scattered forces may rally. These are our principles:

"One standard of morality for both sexes.

"Respect for the human person, which should never be looked upon merely as a means [an instrument, tool or machine] for others.

"Recognition and guaranty of the rights of woman, as well as of the rights of man, each to be equally free and responsible.

"Intervention in behalf of those who, because of their state of subordination or relative feebleness, are unable to defend themselves against invasion.

"Opposition to all species of official organization of debauchery and condemnation of all such measures of discrimination taken under the pretext of morality.

"In a word: Justice! That is our motto.

"Vast is the field of activity which awaits us.

"Without announcing in advance all the subjects to be considered, we will indicate, as entering more directly within the scope of the "Review," the following:

"Sexual morality, love and libertinage; the rights of woman and the woman movement: the family, marriage and free union; seduction, illegitimacy and infanticide; prostitution, panderism and the colonizing of women, inspectors of morals; the protection of children and others whose state of dependence makes them the easy prey of luxury and exploitation; the respective roles of man and woman in society; and other phases of the social question which are connected more or less with the preceding, such as the means of livelihood of poor girls, wages, education of children, alcoholism, public and private hygiene, depopulation, militarism, etc.

"We think, in fact, that the intersexual problem should be studied in all its aspects, without narrowness of view and without neglecting anything pertaining to it.

"We address a warm and pressing appeal to all those who, comprehending the importance of these problems, believe there is something to be done in the way of reforming customs and laws in view of a better future, and we count on their support. We particularly appeal to the women, who are the most concerned in our undertaking, for without their support we shall not be able to gain the one cause which is hers and that of humanity.

"The present regime is incoherent and profoundly unjust, full of tears and misery. A renovation is necessary; a work of destruction and of reconstruction, for the freedom of the individual and of the social order. However unworthy we may be for so great and so noble a task, we shall undertake it with all our heart according to the measure of our ability.

"Hope and faith in the future era of justice shall not be a chimera. To have an ideal is still the most sure guide."

The price of the magazine is 10 francs ($2) a year. Address Revue de Morale Sociale, Giard et Briere, 16 rue Soufflot, Paris, France.

A Pen-Picture from Life.

C. A. M. in "Coming Light."

"Jim, O Jim! get up!" shouted the man at the foot of the stairs. "It's four o'clock. Do ye hear?"

"Yes sir," came the nervous answer.

The farmer strode through the house, banging doors after him, pausing only to remark to his patient overworked wife, "That boy is a perfect deadhead."

Her lips quivered, but she said nothing. Wearily she moved about the shed kitchen preparing the breakfast, while anxiously watching the clock as the minutes flew by. Presently she took a candle in her hand and went up the stairs. A strange light glowed in her face as she bent over the boy, who jumped nervously from his sleep to an upright position and gazed with frightened eyes in the direction of the light.

"O Mom, is that you?" he cried, as their lips met in a morning kiss.

"Yes, Jimmy. Your father called you and I was afraid you would not get up in time."

The child sprang from bed and hurried into his clothing. It was the work of several minutes to get the swollen feet into the hard, crooked boots that sat on the floor at the foot of the bed. The tears would come in spite of his manly effort to repress them. He stumbled down the steps painfully, saying, "Never mind, Mom, after I've walked around a bit I shan't mind," and he hugged the little mother who was wiping the tears away on the corner of her checked apron.

"It's about time yer gettin' here," said the farmer as the boy entered the barn. "Here, oil this harness and feed them horses, then milk the cows while I go to the pen to feed the shoats, and be quick about it, young man. We must git the hay in 'fore night."

The man stalked off with a sack of grain upon his shoulders and the little wizened speck of humanity proceeded to carry out his orders. His hands were cracked and hard, and as he oiled the harness the blood flowed from the cracks which spread to seams. Occasionally he waved the burning hands in the cool air to relieve them. The fourteen horses in the great barn were then fed, and this mere babe of ten years picked up the milk pails and sought the barn yard where cows and milk stools would have made an interesting picture had the child been enjoying a morning nap instead of being obliged to milk them twice each day all alone, except when "Mom" could steal time from the house and its ceaseless care to lend him a little aid. This morning she could not come, so the little cracked, bleeding hands tugged away at first one cow and then another, until eight were milked. At first he groaned with the pain of it, then softly sobbed in contemplating a lifetime of these daily rounds of hardship. The tears were pouring at last as he staggered to the house between the mammoth pails he carried.

"Mom" came to meet him and took one pail to the cellar while he carried the other. Her tears came again as she saw the poor bleeding hands of her boy. She had just finished oiling them with warm mutton tallow when the farmer banged the door open and said crossly, "Yes, that's right; betty that chap a little more, will ye? He's a perfect ninny now, and will never be a man."

The child slunk shamefacedly into a corner.

"Go and fill up the woodbox," said the man. "Ye never see anything to do, and if ye did yer too lazy to do it." The child was trembling with fright but hastened to obey.

The mother protested against such hard, incessant labor for a growing boy. The farmer answered, "Ye needn't tell me what that boy should and should not do. He's mine, and while I've got my wits about me he'll pay for his keep, and I don't want to see any more salt water about it either."

He drew his chair angrily up to the table and began to eat his breakfast. His wife poured the coffee and the child tried to eat as his father's glaring eyes searched his tear-stained face. "Mom" could not eat, and finally the boy said, "Mom, this corn bread is fine; taste it," and he spread a generous supply of butter upon part of his slice and handed to her. She tried to smile and swallowed a mouthful or two to please "Jimmy."

Grabbing his hat from the nail the man said, "Come on," and then started for the barn. The boy followed, then ran back for a kiss behind the kitchen door, where he knew "Mom" was waiting.

She watched them climb on the hay rack and drive away. Then throwing herself upon the bed she gave way to the grief which was wearing her heart away. "What shall I do? How can I make a home somewhere for me and Jimmy? O God, is there no way out of this horrible prison?" She grew more calm at length and put the house in order. The dishes washed, she rolled out the great wooden churn and began the slow, tedious process of butter making. Her face flushed, then paled, as her eyes flashed with thoughts of possible freedom for herself and boy.

That was one morning.

Dinner was waiting now, and soon the rattling of harness announced "the men." Hurrying the dinner on the table she watched the men file in, waited upon them with water, coffee and milk, then turned her eyes in the direction of the barn where the boy had been left to feed the teams. He looked so old and wan, even through the tan that browned his cheeks. When finally he was seated at the table with clean face and smooth hair he was greeted by further unkindness from his father:

"Got around, did ye? Yer the slowest mortal I ever saw. 'Spose ye'd stop and pike up if the house was afire." The men laughed, and the boy choked some dinner down in silence and revenge.

This was one noon.

The scorching sun beamed down upon the burning earth as "the men" started again for the hay field. Anxiously "Mom" watched the wagons down the lane, as she wondered if the child would live through another such "awful" day. Her busy fingers pared the apples, to dry for winter use, all the long weary afternoon. It was almost sunset now. The kettle was hung and supper under way. She watched the sun recede from sight and the twilight shadows gather ere the hay rack came in view adown the dusty lane. The lamps were lighted now and they drew once more around the table. No one spoke till the meal was ended, then the farmer said shortly, "Jim, get the buckets and do the milkin'."

The child moved off and the father picked up a paper. An hour passed, then he called out angrily, "Hain't Jim done milkin' yet? It takes him forever to do nothin'."

Jim came in just in time to hear this remark. He and "Mom" strained the milk and put it in the cellar. This done, he sank into a chair and began to look at the pictures in a child's book that some one had given him.

"Put that book up and go to bed," said the man. "You'll be no account to-morrow without some sleep." Reluctantly the boy obeyed.

"Come on now, let's turn in for the night," said the man to his wife as he strode toward the bed-room.

"Yes, presently," said she. "I have a little more to do to prepare for morning."

She sat in the kitchen waiting. Bye and bye she crept noiselessly to the bed-room door, shading the light with her hand. "Yes, he is asleep," she said to herself with a sigh of relief. Taking a basin of water and some towels she dragged her tired form upstairs. Wringing a couple of towels out of the water she bound them on the boy's swollen feet. She then dipped some cloths in warm mutton tallow and bound them on his hands; then wrung out another towel and bound on the back of his neck, kissing his feet, hands and face as he did so. He slept heavily through it all until the wet towel touched the back of his neck. He opened his eyes then and said, "O, Mom, what would I do without you?"—and they wept in each other's arms.

"Try to sleep now, dear," said the mother as she gathered up the things and returned to the room below, where only snores broke the silence. It was eleven o'clock before she was robed for the night.

This was one evening.

There were others.

Winter evenings, when the boy's feet were burst open from chilblains, when his hands were full of bleeding seams from husking corn! Evenings when he lay in a stupor from weariness and "Mom" frantically waited for returning consciousness, while the man slept and snored in utter oblivion of their existence! Evenings when neither of them slept until day dawn, talking and trying to plan how to get away and live.

The years went by until "Mom" grew too tired one day and folded her hands in eternal rest. The boy was sixteen then and never came home from his mother's grave. Neighbors helped search for him, but he was beyond their reach. He had walked to the nearest town and boarded a train for a large city. The money? Well, it was "Mom's" dying gift. She had surreptitiously saved it, dime by dime, in a little tin can, from the revenue butter making brought. Stolen? Yes, every cent of it, but the boy is free and so is "Mom."

Who is to blame?

Love.

BY SARA C. CAMPBELL.

"Love is doomed." Not by any manner of means. L. D. W. is altogether mistaken. It is but the counterfeit love which in the past was conceded by most men and some women to be love that is "doomed to be relegated to the attics and garrets—banished with other broken Gods that have served their time." Real love, "the love that poets idealize in song and verse," etc., the love that has ever been the ideal of true manhood and true womanhood, this kind of love can never die, but will live and flourish and fill the whole earth with its loveliness.

In the future, instead of "men seeking each other for intellectual companionship, a circle into which woman are not admitted and have no place," listen to Joseph Dejacque in Lucifer, No. 755. He says.

"Say to the man and to the woman that their destinies are to draw nearer together and to understand each other better; that they have one and the same name as they are one and the same being—the human being; that they are, each in turn, the one the right and the other the left hand and that in the human identity their hearts are as one heart and their thoughts are inseparable. Say to them that in this condition only can they be able to sustain and support each other in the journey and the light of their love shall pierce the shadows that separate the present from the future, or civilized society from harmonized society. Tell them the human being, in its relative proportions and manifestations, is like the glow-worm which shines only by love and for love."

Read all of "The Human Being" in Lucifer 754 and 755, then read "The Truth About Love, and "Love and True Marriage" in "Sex Ethics" or better still, read the whole of "Sex Ethics," and help humanity evolve to that state where real love will be the motor power of the universe.

A Significant Sign.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton in the "Commonwealth."

A little wayside inn in England, called "The Four Alls," had a significant sign. Whether painted by some wag or a philosopher it gives the working masses the key to their hopeless slavery. In the center of the sign are the letters "All." On one side stands the soldier in military dress, pointing to the letters; he says, "I fight for all." On the other side stands the bishop in sacred vestments, pointing to the letters, he says, "I pray for all." Above sits the king in royal robes, pointing down; he says, "I rule for all." Underneath stands the laborer in ragged garments, hollow-eyed, bent and bony; he says, "I pay for all."

If the masses, sunk in poverty, ignorance and vice, understood the lesson taught by this sign, they would throw off the burden and demand an equal share in the necessities of life, shelter, food, clothes, education, time for rational amusement, recreation and release from burdensome taxation. In what is termed hard times all the well-to-do classes shift their burdens on the laborer. With a new tax on real estate, the owner raises the rent; with an added tax on manufactures, a higher price is demanded for clothes, the tools of the artisan, the implements of husbandry, and on all that the masses eat, drink and wear. They pay a tax on every match they light, on every pipe they smoke, on every loaf of bread, every cup of coffee and glass of beer.

An observant Swede went into a lawyer's office, saying: "You see I buy me a piece of land and I tank I shall have a mortgage on it." The lawyer told him he did not want a mortgage, what he wanted was a deed. "No, I tank I want me a mortgage. I buy me two pieces of land before an' got deed for dem, an' 'nother feller came with mortgage an' take 'em. I tank I better have mortgage dis air time."

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

WALTER HURT, editor of the "Gatling Gun," Cleveland, O., has been indicted on nine counts. Friends of freedom of publication should see to it that the paper which he represents is supported, whether they agree with him or not.

THE KANSAS FREETHOUGHT Association will hold its annual convention in Forest Park, Ottawa, Aug. 23 to 29, inclusive. This Park is a splendid place for such lectures—has a lecture hall, dining hall, dormitories, etc. For further particulars, address Etta Semple, Ottawa, Kas.

ANOTHER WEEK with no letter for Lucifer from the editor. He expected to remain only a few hours in New Orleans, but met with such a warm reception that his stay was prolonged for several days. He also spoke at two meetings. "My experiences here," he writes, "have been unique—nothing like them in some respects. Such hearty and generous hospitality and such complete appreciation and such intelligent understanding of Lucifer's central work, I have seldom or never found among those who have not been habitual readers of our literature. . . . Am feeling stronger today (April 14) than usual, though I did not sleep so well last night as I generally do. Don't know that it is best for me to try to do so much talking, but if I could manage my appetite, and could get what I want to eat and drink I think the talking would not hurt me, but would be a help by diverting my attention from my own ailments. . . . My time is so taken up with visiting and sight-seeing, that I seem to have none left for writing—or rather I have no energy left for writing."

How the Age of Consent Law Works.

Colorado is one of the states which acquired a high age-of-consent law when the craze for such legislation was at its height. Now it is reaping the natural results of its action.

In '97 Frank Conlon boarded with a Mrs. Sullivan in Boulder. She had a daughter of fourteen who was reported to be unusually developed mentally and physically for her age. The daughter and Conlon became very friendly, and all went well until in the summer of '97 a disagreement arose and Conlon was arrested under the age-of-consent law, charged with rape. "The evidence introduced at the trial shows that the girl was forced to testify against him by the mother under the threat of being sent to the State Home for Girls if she refused. While giving her evidence she fainted twice and had to be removed from the court room, and although there was no other direct testimony against the accused he was sentenced to twelve years in the penitentiary, where he is now. . . Nannie Butterfield, Mrs. Sullivan's daughter, who was the complaining witness, has lately made an affidavit that her testimony against Conlon was perjured and that he was never guilty of any wrong to her, and that she testified as she did because she had been threatened by her mother."

I quote the above from the Colorado "Representative," which adds: "Before getting into this trouble, Conlon's reputation here was very good and much surprise was expressed at the outcome of the trial."

The victim and his friends are poor, and the only reason that his case is brought to the attention of the public now, is that a lawyer (O. A. Johnson), who has learned of the facts has interested himself in the matter. His case is to be brought before the board of pardons which, it is hoped, will release him when convinced that he was convicted on perjured evidence.

It seems that such a case as this ought to make people think. Doubtless the mother believed that in ruining the man she was saving her daughter from ruin.

The power which is placed in the hands of the ignorant and prejudiced is terrible in its effects. Under the "protection" afforded by the age-of-consent law it is possible for anyone to separate lovers if the woman is under eighteen, and send the man to prison, no matter at what cost to the woman; and on the other hand, if a man outrages his wife no one can object. Before marriage a woman belongs to the state, after marriage to her husband; never to herself. L. H.

A Persian Pearl and Other Essays.*

This is the title of a series of essays by Clarence S. Darrow, comprising "A Persian Pearl" (the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam); "The Skeleton in the Closet;" "Walt Whitman," "Realism in Literature and Art," and "Robert Burns."

Mr. Darrow's works are full of gems, and the temptation is to quote at length. In his address on Walt Whitman, he says:

"To Walt Whitman there could be no thought of class or caste. . . . He had no faith in those laws and institutions which the world has ever made to defraud and enslave, and deny the common brotherhood of all. He believed that every child that came upon the earth was legitimate and had an equal right to land, and sea, and air, and all that nature gave.

'Each of us is inevitable,
Each of us limitless—each of us with his or her right upon the earth,
Each of us allow'd the eternal purports of the earth,
Each of here as divinely as any is here.'

"Walt Whitman's democracy did not end with sex. Man is not always a logical animal. Most of the practical democracy of the world has stopped with men, and generally with white men at that. The political equality of woman has only barely been considered; the still more important question, her economic independence, is yet a far-off dream. But Walt Whitman knew no limit to equality. With him equality meant equality. It could mean nothing else.

'I am the post of the woman the same as the man
And I say it is as great to be a woman as to be a man,
And I say there is nothing greater than the mother of men.'

"Probably Walt Whitman would not have raised his hat to a woman on the street, nor given her his seat in the car, simply because she was a woman. Both of these may be well enough, but they grow from false ideas of women, and of course through these false ideas women lose the most. Injustice and oppression can never be made up by chivalry and pretended courtesy. And the evil always is and must be the false relation which these create. Men expect to pay women for their economic and political freedom in theater tickets and by taking off their hats in public, and in the end women become willing to receive this paltry and debasing bribe."

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

This edition is rendered into English by Edward Fitzgerald, with notes and an original introduction, brief but sufficient.

Heretofore Omar Khayyam has been known only to a few who cultivated him as a literary fad and recognized Fitzgerald's interpretation as a marvel of felicitous translation. But he should be known to and read and circulated by freethinkers, for the old Persian poet is pre-eminently one of us. His protest and satire against the dogmatic religion of his time and country is equally applicable to our time and country, for superstition is the same in all races and climes, and the Christian superstition is borrowed from Omar's day and generation and from other religious developments of the human mind. Previous editions of this wonderful interpretation of a wonderfully keen dissection of religion, are loaded down with notes and introductions and lives and pictures till the cost is high, and our "old Omar" is removed from the plain of popularity. The little edition just issued by the "Truth Seeker" has the introduction necessary to present him to the non-oriental student and the notes which make the verses plain. Those who wish to delve further into the history of the Persian philosopher and his gifted interpreter will find it a pleasant field. A few Christian poets are now having their flings at Omar, but their productions are doggerel compared to Fitzgerald's magnificent verses, and affect him no more than the light of a candle affects the brilliancy of the sun. All liberals should have this poem, and they will find it will bear reading and re-reading. Justin Huntly McCarthy, M. P., one of England's brightest intellects, who made a fine prose translation of Khayyam's quatrains, used to carry a copy of Fitzgerald's interpretation in his pocket for study at leisure moments—a purpose for which this edition is admirably fitted.

*Printed on rough-surface, English "Boxmoor" paper, rubricated side-heads and initials. In boards, $2, in limp green chamois, silk-lined, $2.50. Edition limited to 980 copies, each book numbered. Published by the Roycrofters, East Aurora, N. Y., and may be ordered through this office.

The cover of this pamphlet is from special and most appropriate design by W. Parker Bodfish, printed on the Victorieux cover paper. Price 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Man vs. Husband.

BY ARGO.

Man, the image of God, is a being in whose heart kindness, sympathy, honor and love abounds; under no circumstances will he intrude on the sacred rights of woman. Man repects the person of woman as the most sacred of all things animate or inanimate. Man regards the woman with whom he associates as his equal in all things, and the absolute owner of her own person and property, to the same extent after as before marriage. Man makes use of the marriage license and ceremony only to protect the woman he marries from the venomous tongues of the scandal monger in the church and the self-constituted "elite" of the community in which he resides. He does not consider the marriage license gives him any greater right over the person of his wife than he had before he paid his dollar to the clerk who issued such license.

A man never attempts to exercise any restraint over his wife. When he uses the term "my wife," or, speaking of another woman, "his wife," he does not mean ownership, for he does not consider that any man can under any circumstances acquire the ownership of any woman. The grandest, noblest and most sublime appellation that can be applied to a female, is to say that she is a woman; the word lady should never be used when speaking of a pure, noble woman; lady carries with it a narrow, imperfect meaning, and describes an inferior grade of woman. Man considers the woman whom the law calls his wife, his partner having equal rights in all things, business matters as well as social affairs. He recognizes her right to dissolve that co-partnership whenever she may choose to do so; to have and hold one-half of the co-partnership property in her own right. No man will exercise any restrictions whatever over his wife, or bind her to him by legislative enactments, or judicial decisions. He will rely on the power of the laws of love and attraction. By respectful consideration of her worth, rights, kindness, and love, he will cause her to cling to and go to him for advice, counsel, sympathy and consolation. The sublime law of nature that impels the earth to turn to the sun for warmth and light, will attract and hold her.

WHAT IS A HUSBAND?

A husband, like a corporation, is created by legislative enactments, entrenched and fortified by judicial decisions. The law extends to a husband privileges and authority not desired by man, the image of God. Under the marriage laws a husband expects and exacts obedience from the one woman whom he calls wife, without regard to her condition or feelings. The Bible teaches, the church upholds and encourages, and the law enforces obedience to the demands of the husband. A husband may be a man but all husbands are not men. Some have the attributes and principles of men but such are exceptions to the rule: a law-made husband is a male being who has purchased the legal right (a marriage license) to ravish a certain woman if he desires to do so. He restricts the liberty of his wife; he uses the term wife in the possessive case. When he says "my wife," to him it is the same as "my horse." He regards her as a thing for his special pleasure, as his personal property; and when she demurs thereto he reminds her that she promised to both love and obey him in all things. A husband has the form and some of the features of a man, but he is not a man, he is only a husband. He is jealous and selfish, he keeps a continual surveillance over the daily life of his wife. Before marriage he was courteous, attentive and kind; but the courtship ended, the marriage ceremony finished, he at once assumes a different attitude toward her; she is his slave and he the master, a condition made possible only through the teachings of the church and the enforcement of man-made laws.

A husband is a legal fiction, not a natural person. The husband derives his authority over his wife through the law made by himself. Very like a corporation, which has been defined to be "a fictitious person without a soul to damn or condemn, having no body to imprison, punish or burn, no conscience to appeal to." When a woman takes a husband she surrenders her individuality, loses her identity, her name, and as Shakespeare is wont to say that "priceless jewel." Her loss is greater than her gain. It is true she has a husband to protect her from other men, but who protects her from her husband? Who can or dare step in and interfere with the husband's rights given him by the marriage laws? She is his (wife) property. No one dare attempt to arrest a husband, though he forces admission to the bed of his wife. He is protected by the marriage law in going to her bed at his will and pleasure without consulting her wishes. She may protest but the law affords her no relief. The law, the judges and the courts say that he may do that to his wife which if done to any other woman would be a crime punishable by imprisonment. In many cases very soon after the marriage the wife, to her sorrow, discovers that she has made a mistake; that her husband has inherited consumption, insanity or that his blood is otherwise tainted, and that he is not a fit person to be the father of her children. What can she do? Appeal to the law for relief? No. The courts cannot grant her any relief. She must quietly endure her affliction and bow to the power of the marriage laws of the land. Suicde or insanity brings relief to many noble women.

If the marriage laws were so modified that married women, equally with single women, should have the exclusive control of her person, coupled with the right to select the father of her children, she then in a measure would be compensated for the loss of her liberty.

The Home.

BY EDGAR D. BRINKERHOFF.

In Lucifer, April 1, L. D. W. and M. Florence Johnson assume, the one regretfully, the other rejoicingly, that the home must go because "there is not a single thing a wife can do that a man can not have done more satisfactorily and at less expense in the general market." They forget that the woman must keep a home for her children, and that it is the most natural thing in the world to have a man about. I am not afraid to use the word natural notwithstanding recent flings against it. The home is with us to stay because it is very, very natural. Some features that are unnatural will not survive, as the custom that allows the man to usurp the woman's place as head of the family. The way in which the future man will purchase home comforts in the general market will be to join some existing or prospective family home in the capacity of a boarder. The home, like trade, land and banking, needs to be freed. Mrs. Johnson could not say those bitter things against the free home.

The home is not, however, the only natural thing. Nature is not seriously violated when a woman avoids propagation and enters into commercial or scientific pursuits for a part or all of her life. Savagedom is not the only place in which to find nature. Nature lies just as much ahead of us as behind us. What is in harmony with the constitution of things is natural. There are degrees of naturalness. We use the word unnatural to designate a very low degree of naturalness. Those things that nature has found it necessary irrevocably to discard were natural in so low a degree that we regard them as unnatural. Government in the home is so unnatural that it will yet pass away. The free home is so natural that is bound finally to survive. An exclusively commercial life is so much less natural for women than housekeeping, that it will stand no show in competition with the free home. There is something about a home that makes a man want to indulge in one, especially those who have tried the furnished-room-restaurant-laundry plan. Even if pressing a Bellamy button would bring any desired material thing, woman will be wanted as a help-meet if for nothing else than to press the button to have everything in readiness for the man returning from work.

Nature sometimes gets a set-back. The home was more nearly right at one time than now. Artificial influences afterward prevailed, and the home reverted to a lower type. But as "truth crushed to earth will rise again," so a more natural home will be again evolved. Even experiment is natural. When society becomes free more natural institutions will develop than were dreamed of in any savage tribe.

Spiritualism and Social Freedom.

In the "Progressive Thinker" of March 18, Hudson Tuttle was asked his opinion of the "Anti-Christian Spiritualist Order." In his reply the free love or anti-marriage plank in their "Declaration of Principles"* is what he strikes hardest at, and my comments on that is, I think, the reason my reply was not accepted. The following is a condensation of that reply.

Mr. Tuttle says Spiritualism is not Anti. Now if I know what Christianity teaches, Spiritualism is decidedly Anti-Christian. Webster defines the word, "Opposite to, or opposing the Christian religion." Christianity teaches special creation of a perfect man; the fall of man, thus necessitating a savior; this savior immaculately conceived of a virgin by the Holy Ghost (whatever that may be), and the only salvation for the human race must come through this virgin-born man god.

Spiritualism teaches development of the human race through evolutionary processes; that only through growth and one's own efforts can the soul be redeemed from ignorance. Antipodes to be sure.

With 35,000 people owning more of a nation's wealth than the remaining 70,060,000, and Spiritualists turning their halls into churches, their lecturers into reverends, their healers into doctors, and with their eyes turned upward in prayer and singing "Nearer My God to Thee," and of the "Beautiful Homes Over There," with a national organization that avows a part of its mission to "build homes for indigents," it seems to me the time is ripe for the wise spirits to come to earth and take control of the old ship of state and help us to weather the storm we are now abreast of before we are entirely wrecked, and what little of civilization we have is destroyed.

Look abroad over the land and see the blots in the shape of institutions for the criminal, the insane, the imbecile, the deaf, dumb and blind, the reform schools for children too young to be classed as criminal—all degenerates—then ask yourse'ves candidly: Does the respectability church and state tags us with for following her edicts, pay the cost? Read and reflect.

"An enlightened free race—once this can be said of humanity—will contain no degenerates. This reform which demands freedom for love is the only true method whereby there can be a redeemed humanity. Marriage as it is legalized, granting authority to husbands, ownership of the wife, destroys the real means whereby a race can be evolved to its highest perfection in the mortal. Of women mothers are made, of mothers are born humanity."

Can any mind capable of thought beyond the narrow limits of selfishness fail to see these truths? Can you not see why church and state cling so tenaciously to this marriage system which breeds the kind of people the above-named institutions are builded to care for? A race of people born from slave mothers can easily be held subject to unjust systems of economics and religions.

Brother Tuttle sets up the same old scarecrow that church and state frightens would-be respectables with, refusing their tag of respectability if we refuse to comply with their regulations and laws.

No child born of love, and welcome, could be a degenerate, whether under legal sanction or outside of it. Nature cares nothing for man-made laws. The present degenerates are proof of how severely she punishes disobedience of her edicts. I read, "Freedom for love is a point to be considered wisely."

Mr. Tuttle has used nearly a half column to prove the bestiality of man. This is self-evident, and that it is true, is the great need of the work of this order. He wants "The strong hand of social order expressed in law" to control this; But does it do it? Instead it grants a license in marriage to all manner of bestiality, and the poor victim who "believes and yields to it," has no redress in law. Law acknowledges no such thing as rape in marriage. "Once consent, always consent." Thus saith the law.

This "law and social order" condemns a vast army of our sisters as sacrifices on the altar of man's lust in houses of prostitution (legalized) and dooms another vast army who are working for a mere pittance, to this walk of life for the clothes to make a decent appearance before their masters. With all this, and the prostitution under legal sanction, I ask where is our boasted virtue? Is it this class that are attracted to reformatory movements and talk of mateship in love and freedom? For shame; these are the parents (legal) of the degenerates that this order must labor to lift up and out of their inherited tendencies to bestiality, intemperance, hatred and murder. The shallowness of the assumption that "These doctrines come up like fetid odors from the hot-beds of passion and are advocated because a plausible excuse is offered for their gratification," is too palpable to be worthy of notice. That any person would stand in the fore front of such an order to be misjudged, denounced and all the vile epithets that vile minds can command to be hurled at them, for the opportunity to gratify lustful desires, when the opportunity is staring every one thus inclined in the face under legal sanction and respectability, and outside, too, if one be hypocritical enough to keep it covered, is the height of absurdity.

One important point to be mentioned is, no officer receives any salary and no dues are collected for membership. Surely a labor of love to elevate humanity. Yours for the whole truth along all lines of reform.

The Reform of All Reforms.

For more than twelve years I have tried to study our social and industrial conditions with what ability I possess, and without prejudice. A great part of these years I believed that Moses Harman was giving unwarranted prominence to the reforms he advocates, mainly, "liberty in love." But my observation teaches me that he knew much better than I, that his prophetic judgment discerned much further and deeper than mine.

I have been inclined to the belief that if women were industrially free and independent matters would ultimately right themselves. But they never will be thus conditioned until a generation is born of the right kind of mothers—mothers who rightly prize the freedom they should maintain and do not.

The reason we have so few genuine reformers today is because we have so few women who possess sense enough to know their rights and dare maintain them. This infernal cringing to the powers that be, this despicable indifference to outrageous conditions that are making a veritable hell for nearly half the race, all come through lack of intelligent motherhood, and the situation can never be materially improved (as Moses Harman has for years contended) until mothers come to know and appreciate that freedom is better than slavery, that self-ownership is only an inalienable right, and in the name of humanity demand and maintain this right.

I used to believe that reform would come without awaiting the slow process of breeding a new generation of the right kind of reformers, but I am becoming discouraged. "Fool mothers invariably breed fool children. The exceptions are so few as to prove the rule. About the only thing we can do is to give Lucifer as liberal support as possible and continue, in the name of humanity, to protest and protest against every form of injustice, oppression and monopoly; after awhile the sun may break through the clouds.

Has any five or ten cent booklet yet been written that stands in the same relation to the woman's emancipation reform that "Merrie England" does to socialism? If not it should be written. I would like to hear from Lucifer's readers on this question.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Argo, Ia.—Please apply the enclosed two dollars on subscription to Lucifer. You will also find enclosed the epitiome of my observations of the practical results of our marital laws after twenty-five years active practice, during which time I have been employed in several hundred divorce and other cases, growing out of the relationship of husband and wife under existing laws.

L. E., Ottawa, Kas.—I am trying to get a breathing spell after a very busy winter. I am watching with great interest the reports of your good father's health. I hope to be always able to send you a big round dollar whenever due, only wishing it was $5. The female laborers in any avenue find only a limited supply, even under the most favorable circumstances; and when the mother heart is taxed for supply of food, raiment and education, it seems all too little, but I try to remember "there are others." You may be sure of my sympathy and respect, and my assistance whenever possible.

Frank E. Leonard, Okla—In the main, I heartily approve of what M. Florence Johnson has to say under the title "Epistolatory Fragments," in Lucifer, No. 756; but when she says: "We all know the present system is far from satisfactory, so why not allow honest individuals to try their ideals and see if there would be improvements?" it seems to me that she weakens her position quite materially. Why not allow all individuals to try their ideals? I judge her use of "honest" in that connection is merely a slip of the pen, but if I am mistaken in that, would be pleased to learn her reasons.

[This point is well taken and shows the need of using language that truly conveys our ideas. The only thought I had in using "honest" was that dishonest persons now live as they please, hiding the result, and those who would honestly give the result of experience to the world that we may improve thereby, are ostracised. I believe in all individuals being free, or, in other words, in universal liberty. M. F. J.]

L. A. D., Springfield, Mass.—By the kindness of my friend Chavannes of Knoxville, I have seme copies of your paper. I enclose trial subscription and request that "John's Way" be sent me as a premium. You who are in such a position that you receive many letters from friends of the cause, and often meet them personally, cannot imagine what a mighty lonesome world this is for those of us who are working without any companionship save that of our own thoughts. Although I am but thirty years of age, this subject has had my attention almost since the dawn of conscious manhood, let us say for the last fifteen or sixteen years. During this time I have believed in, and advocated, equal rights for women in all respects. Holding that a woman, and she alone, has the right to determine how and where and when she shall dispose of her personal favors; realizing that the woman who marries for a home is none the less a prostitute because she sells herself to one man, losing even the poor privilege of a voluntary selection, and feeling that she has no right to repent of a bad bargain once made; and observing how, when the laws of Nature and the artificial laws of man come in conflict, the artificial is compelled to give way to the real; meeting with total lack of sympathy for high aims and ideals, is it any wonder that I am "sore" on the scant-brained majority of the world who have no standard of right and wrong, no greater thought or no greater degree of progress than was measured by their ancestors of two centuries ago? Is it any wonder that I should welcome, even on the printed page, the evidence of minds such as mine own? I have many friends, so-called, but I would trade the whole bunch for a half-dozen people who were like myself, only more so. "Fewer friends, and closer," is the way I feel about the matter. In this wilderness of ignorance where I live I am, so far as I am aware, entirely without sympathizers or co-workers. If there be any such I should be delighted to know them.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

At last we have a cheap and good American edition of this incomparable creation of the Astronomer-Poet of Persia, as rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Once read, "The Rubaiyat" is read again and again and each time with new insight and delight.

It is the wish of Swinburne that the rich gift of Omar Khayyam of Naish apur may "be tasted in that most exquisite English translation, sovereignly faultless in form and color of verse, which gives to those ignorant of the East a relish of the treasure and a delight in the beauty of its wisdom." With sketch of Omar's life. Symbolical cover. Price 10 cents. Address M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 256 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Ideala was a woman too thoughtful, too honest, too true for the conventional "middle class" English society in which she lived. Her life-story furnishes much food for thought for those who like to study the facts of life when disguised as fiction. 195 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth, with silver lettering. Price, postpaid, 25 cents.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Facts, 10 cents.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Hear all sides, then decide." 23 chapters; 428 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eye-witnesses, the threats of mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.25, and 15 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalisation of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 15 cents, for sale at this office.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

Contains matter pertaining to the Legitimation League and the Personal Rights Association of England. Also, four fine full page portraits of Ezra H. Heywood, Moses Harman, Lillian Harman and Lois Waisbrooker, together with sketches of their personalities and work. By Oswald Dawson. Neatly bound in boards. Price, 20 cents. Address Moses Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 288 pages. Price, 50 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty. The whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. The World.

Fashion, the world, society, to me
These ever are as some brave board outspread,
Where men and women feign to feast, unfed;
Smiling and gay, yet holding in each eye
The pit-sore hunger of the soul's agony.
Ah! this alone is death, and these the dead;
And yet men call it "life" pitying, instead,
The child-like soul that loves simplicity.

A padded pomp, chill state, a gaslight glare,
The bitter-sweet and dust of discontent,
Soul-hunger and a secret none dare broach—

These are thy wages, world, thy servants wear
Upon their brows the stamp of manhood spent,
Lost innocence, and haunting, vague reproach.

Paragraphs.

BY REV. SIDNEY HOLMES.

It requires more courage to grant others the right to their opinion than it does to fight for your own.

A privilege is a "private law;" it is particular favor enjoyed by some one or more persons which is not enjoyed by all.

We would be more charitable in dealing with those who disagree with us if we would remember that belief is not a matter of choice.

"The greatest of faults," said Thomas Carlyle, "I should say, is to be conscious of none." It is a greater fault, I should say, to be unwilling to be conscious of any.

No word, perhaps, is more generally misunderstood than the word "lust." It literally means "desire," and desire cannot possibly be avoided by any conscious creature.

I am for woman's rights as well as for man's rights; but I am opposed to woman suffrage and to man suffrage, because suffrage is a privilege, and a privilege is never a right.

It is a poverty of words compels people to speak of "laws" of nature. Laws are made by men and can always be evaded. But the course of nature is as old as nature and is unchangeable and inevitable.

Who can doubt the humane spirit of a nation that pays $20,000,000 for the privilege of assuming another nation's fight to subdue the inhabitants of a few Pacific islands who wickedly want to attend to their own affairs in their own way?

A few of the brainiest clergymen in Chicago who have denounced the war policy of the United States are called "visionary dreamers" by the Chicago newspapers, and some of the little preachers are gaining newspaper prominence and adulation by announcing that they are about to form an "Expansion Club."

The word "love" comes from the Sanscrit word "lubh" which means "to be lustful." Lust is desire. Love is desire accompanied with a wish to promote the happiness of the person loved. Lechery is desire which seeks gratification regardless of the wishes of the person desired. Much confusion in the discussion of love results from ignorance of these distinctions.

A man who mounted a dry goods' box in Madison street, Chicago, last Sunday, and began telling his hearers that capitalists were responsible for the woes suffered by the poor was promptly arrested on a charge of "blocking the sidewalk." Half a block away the Salvation Army and Ballington Booth's Volunteers were telling their hearers that the Devil was the cause of the woes of humanity, and they were not molested. Chicago's streets are notoriously dirty, but they evidently belong to the holy trinity Gold, God and Government.

Compulsory Ignorance.

BY HENRY R. THAYER.

It needs no very deep or profound thinker to conceive that a better social order than the one now prevailing could be devised. A large percentage of the people are mentally and morally asleep. To these it does not occur that a better social order is a possibility. Above them there is a progression of thoughtfulness manifested, till at the other extreme are found men vitally awake to the question of race advancement; men to whom it seems such a crying need and vital necessity that they willingly give a whole lifetime to thinking out and living out a solution. This does not necessarily mark these men as heroes, or make them subjects for our pity, for they are simply seeking the line of least resistance, and find it in this manner. It is as foreign to their natures to let the question alone as it is for those at the other end of the scale of perception,—those who "having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not the things that so nearly concern their temporal salvation"—to have any live interest in such matters.

Not to this class, however, will these lines fall, but to those vitally interested in bettering conditions as they find them: interested not through philanthropic and altruistic motives, but because compelled to do so for their own good and pleasure. Altruism and benevolence are not causative, but resultant. They are but the manifestations of selfishness, the higher selfishness that actuates noble minds, the selfishness that recognizes solidarity, and the universal needs of the individual.

In seeking reasons and causes it is seldom that we go back far enough. We are often content to rest on the discovery of a half truth, instead of getting clear behind and under it, to bedrock. To many of the aforesaid thinkers, the cause of Comstockism is found in the Puritanical spirit. This is certainly the great force without the support of which it could not exist, but is it a finality? One would naturally seek back of that the cause of Puritanism. This takes us deep into English history, even into the world's history. I merely remark in passing that it was a reaction, which is a feature of progress. In seeking to go ahead, we move by these reactions, like the swinging of a pendulum, or rather the progress of a man groping through a hallway in the dark, going from side to side as he goes ahead.

All that these Puritans do, however, is to furnish the public sentiment, the moral backing necessary. They do not make laws, they are very seldom represented in legislative bodies.

Who, then, do enact the iniquitous repressionary laws? Who cause them to be enacted? Who is it that closes the press against free speech? Who blocks the way of every investigator into the mysteries surrounding conception, and the nature of the origin of life with a "Thou shalt not"? Who makes it a criminal offense to publish any information concerning the avoidance of too large a family? Who so relentlessly hunts down the man who dares to impart to the mother, broken down with repeated and too-frequent child-bearing, the information which she would give ten years of her life to possess: the ability to avoid bearing another weakling?

We have a condition of the densest ignorance; not merely race-ignorance, nor yet the ignorance which is not yet evolved to a realization of the truths that lie in advance of present ideals, but ignorance of another sort; enforced, compulsory ignorance, and that in a department of human life where there is a recognition of it, and a crying need of knowledge.

In seeking for a cause of some existing economic condition, it seems to me a good plan to hunt for the individual or class that the existing condition will most benefit. In this instance we surely will not have far to seek. It is equally necessary that there should be power to produce and to maintain a given condition. Here, then, are three factors to deal with: enforced ignorance, some one to greatly profit by its enforcement, and someone with power to enforce it, where it is to his profit. Is there any doubt that these apply directly to the monopolist, the exploiter of human labor? Let us see.

The capitalist leads, for the most part, a parasitical existence. He lives on the blood of the worker. In order to be able to do so, it is necessary for the worker to approximate the condition of a slave. His rights and privileges must be brought down to the smallest compass, while it is equally necessary at the same time to make him think he is a free agent in all matters, and quite able to do just as he pleases. As he is a short-sighted creature, and trained to short-sightedness, this is no hard task. He is given a set of conditions much to his liking, as an ideal, and is fooled and hypnotized into believing that they really exist. He is made to think that he is a factor in the government. Why, hasn't he that little piece of paper called a vote, which enables him to be ruled by whomsoever he will, and doesn't this make him self-governing? The poor fool really thinks it does. It does not occur to him that he has not the slightest voice in the selection of the men whom he can vote for, and that there is no real choice. So if he does not get the condition of affairs which he hoped to by casting a vote, he is told that he cast the wrong one, that the other kind was necessary to bring all the desires of his heart. It would seem that any fool could see that the whole voting system was a farce, and that every vote he cast was a vote for the continuance of his slavery,—but no. Even those who think seek only to better existing conditions, so grounded is our habit of holding on to a worn-out past, and seeking to patch it, and to re-patch the patches, rather than to cut loose and weave a new fabric.

The press, which is so universally owned by the money power, the wage slave is not bright enough to regard as an organ of the plutocrats, whose news, and editorials in particular, are worded so as to show the exploiters in the best possible light. He believes that paper as he does his Bible, because it says it is true and inspired. What hope for a man who can prove anything by itself?

I have been digressing somewhat, to show that ignorance exists in the minds of so many of the men from whom the coming race must spring. I need not say that many of them, if given a chance, would gladly reverse their positions, becoming exploiters of other men, instead of the exploited. When they had reached this position the grievances of the under dogs would pass from their memories like a bad dream, and they would uphold grabbing as well as any man born into a fortune.

To return to the subject: Why this repression of every movement in the line of race progress? Why these strenuous efforts to keep people in ignorance? Too many credit the whole business to the Puritans and the prudes. As they are not the politicians or the law-makers, how can they be responsible?

All the effects of education are to make the worker a less valuable slave, but nowhere is this truer than in regard to the improvement or limitation of offspring. The exploiter well knows that the man who knows himself too poor to properly care for and educate a child is entirely in his power when the unwilling father of six or seven. If possessed of the knowledge that would enable him not to have so large a family, or none at all if he saw fit, he would be many times more able to revolt. What a man with a large sickly family would never, could never, dare think of doing, he would risk. He could make and enforce demands. If he had one or two children, healthy and desired, loved by their mothers during gestation, they would be so apt to be happy children with clear minds, who would grow up to be thinkers.

Suppose all the men in a factory were free from the encumbrance of a large family, and their women companions were not drudges, the slaves of the children and husbands—there would be a vast deal more of independence shown. Is it to be wondered at that this is recognized on the part of the exploiters, and laws enacted to try to prevent the spread of such knowledge as will make a more independent race of men inevitable?

Then it is necessary, for the maintenance of the present starvation rate of wages, that there should be more men than places for them. If they cannot make a living wage, they will make half of it, so great is their desire to live a little longer. Under conditions where there are more places than men (which was once the case in the United States) even the unskilled are employed. Wages are higher, for the man can dicker and demand something. With a greatly reduced birthrate, and a greatly improved stock, the condition of the demand equalling the supply would exist, and the capitalist lose a great deal of his power over the worker.

I am sure that some will object to my attributing so much malevolence to the capitalist, or so much power, either. I would not wish to be understood as stating that as a class, he does deliberately seek to injure the worker. He merely seeks the line of least resistance, and it is the most comfortable thing not to think of the worker at all. He knows that it means suffering to the worker, if he thinks at all about it, but he seldom does. If he does, he may state, as an excuse, that it is meant that there should be two classes, the aristocracy, as it were, and their servants. At any rate, whether born rich or poor, he has been brought up to worship money, and regard the possession of it as a mark of superiority. The poor man thinks the same. Perhaps the capitalist began life as a worker. In this instance, he will probably tell you that any man has an equally good chance to get rich, and that it is his own fault if he does not do so. He will ascribe it to his improvidence, or his wastefulness. Probably by telling that story so often he has come to believe it himself.

If we admit that the mass of the capitalists are very much like the common people, there still remains the fact that there are among them a few, who by design, try to keep the people in studied subjection, and in the ignorance best suited to the continuance of it. Perhaps the rest merely fall in with the plan, as best suited to their needs, also. With hired lobbyists, and a plentiful use of money in the way of bribes, is there any doubt that a few can get laws passed to this end, and that they are doing so?

I do not consider the outlook for the worker very hopeful. He is not ready to rise and throw off the yoke in a successful revolution. He is encumbered with notions and traditions that would make any plan of reconstruction abortive. Nowhere is this so true as in all things referring to a knowledge of all that pertains to life itself. He is slow to take any interest in the science of life; sex is a subject that very few can study in as unbiased a manner as they would arithmetic, and there is still lingering in the minds of the majority the notion that reproduction is a thing which it is dangerous and sinful to attempt to regulate. This notion cannot altogether be laid to the capitalists. It had a deeper and an anterior origin. Where, we can only guess, as history is as silent on that point as is the average mother to her darling daughter, whom she criminally allows to grow up in what she hopes will be unsullied innocence.

The ignorance of the poor man on all economic problems is equally dense, but far from as hopeless. The whole system in vogue he indorses. He believes in money, interest, rent, taxes and banks. He believes in government and, in a great majority of instances, in voting. It is extremely doubtful if he will better things much by a social overturn. His standard is money not labor. If all the capitalists were removed, the smartest of the laborers would soon be filling their places, and singularly enough, these make the very worst slave-drivers. One would expect more consideration from them, but will find it instead in those "to the manor born." The workingman is his own worst enemy. I see no hope, save through the slow, tedious process of evolution, and the education of the masses. By the time these have attained a proper idea of the meaning and scope of the word Justice, and an understanding of the independence of the race, it will be time enough to begin a war of extermination on all the exploiters that remain.

How are we, in the meantime, to get along amid the conditions that are so entirely at variance with our desires and ideals? We find very often that the worker does not wish to be taught. He has a perfect right to remain in ignorance; in that case he hugs his chains and looks on money as rather an end than a means. He seems to us be blind to his higher interests. Nor that alone; if he knew us to be anarchists, free lovers, and atheists, he would not listen at all, but would shun us as his most dangerous enemies. I see no other way in many instances, but to leave him to his own destruction, hoping that from experience he will derive instruction.

It is not, however, to the interest of a radical to leave ignorance undisturbed. Recognizing as he does, the solidarity existing in the entire race, and more particularly among those with whom he is more nearly associated, his near neighbors, he knows that his own greatest stumbling block in the way of freedom is his neighbor's ignorance. It certainly is a dense skull—though there be many such—that will not admit any helpful thoughts from a progressive man's talk.

Every man will seek the path that offers to him the least resistance. To some it may be quietly putting up with things as they are, in spite of the certain knowledge that they need improving, and that some one has got to pitch in and help to do it. To many others it consists in thinking, arguing, agitating and especially trying to live out the problems relating to a happier and more advanced state of society.

The Story of May.

BY HARMO.

Several people have asked me to tell the story of May, and as she herself is quite willing, I will here briefly state the facts of the case, as it may be helpful to those who are querying how to help unmarried mothers.

About three years ago I received this letter:

"DEAR FRIEND:—For God's sake, come to us. Help us, advise us, tell us what can we do. Our little May—my pet—is about to become a mother.

WILTON."

A few days later I took the train and went to meet my sorrowing friend. He met me at the depot with horse and carriage, and during the long drive out to the family residence he told me the facts of the case. May was about to become a mother, and the father of her child could not marry her, because he was her sister's husband. The whole family had turned against the poor child, (she was not yet seventeen) her mother most bitterly of all, and my friend knew they were driving her to destruction. They had decided she must go to a hospital and stay until after the child was born and give it away or place it in an asylum. She vowed if forced to do this she would enter a house of prostitution. He was at his wit's end and knew not what to do, as the other members of the family swore she should not stay at home.

Finally she said to him, "Write to Harmo, Papa, and if she will take me, I will go with her," and so the letter came to me. I talked to the different members of the family as best I could. I told them no woman need be ruined because of a thing like that, for some of the world's best and sweetest spirits had been unmarried mothers.

At the end of a week I brought May home with me; then the storms broke over my own devoted head. Self righteous neighbors told me if I kept "that thing" in my house, every one would be down on me and no one would come and see me. I replied that the world was wide, and there was much more room outside my house than in, and that if they chose to desert me because I followed the dictates of my conscience they could do so, that it mattered but little to me. The storm raged for a while, until the stormers saw I was firm, and then I was left in peace until the babe was born, a lovely girl who now bears the name of two of our leading reform women.

By and by the neighbors becoming curious to see the babe began dropping in, one by one. At first they began pitying May for her ruined life. She told them she would show them her life was not ruined, and she would yet prove that she could live as helpful a life as any of them.

"Yes, oh yes," drawled one sanctimonious gossip, "the vilest sinner may return to the fold." "I refuse to consider myself vile," said my little May. "I consider myself just as pure as any of the rest of you, and purer than some, for I love my child's father."

At one time the deputation came to enquire who the child belonged to. "Why it belongs to me," said May, "to myself and mother Harmo, here; it is mine by birth and hers by love."

Little by little, our gossips became more kindly, when they knew my girlie would not be browbeaten and cast down. Little by little they took her into their good graces, until when our little Flo was six months old she had won the good opinion of all, and was everywhere kindly received; and instead of condemning her, they condemned her family for driving her from home.

Shortly after this time a young social radical came to visit me. He and May were drawn toward each other at once. The attraction grew stronger as the days went by, till friendship grew to love, and they concluded to cast their life lines together. To satisfy the prejudices of the people, they were married according to law; but with the contract between themselves that both should be as free as if unbound by law. And I know that they live up to the spirit of their contract. Their love is something beautiful to see, and May, the girl whose family were driving her to a life of prostitution through their fear of Mrs. Grundy, is a loved and respected woman, and bids fair to lead a useful life. And thanks to my tuition and the lessons learned of Lucifer, she is a free and fearless woman; one who has learned her lesson well—the lesson that no one act can ruin our lives unless we ourselves consent to the ruin.

Free and universal discussion bears the same relation to truth that a road does to a city toward which it surely leads.—William Francis Barnard.

HAMMOND, LA., April 17, '99.

Whether or not an apology is due to the readers of Lucifer for my prolonged silence I know not. Silence is ofttimes better than speech, oral or written. Several causes have conspired to prevent the sending of a weekly letter for publication, each of which is a valid excuse, as I see it.

One of these causes is the chronic pressure of contributed matter asking for space in our columns, and the desire on my part to give all an occasional hearing. Another is the fact that much of the time since my last letter for Lucifer was written I have been in poor condition, mental and physical, for putting my thoughts in shape for publication. The little energy I have been master of has been almost wholly used up in making and receiving social calls, in making "parlor talks," platform talks, and in private and personal correspondence. Several pages of report of my journeyings in the "Land of Flowers" were written at Palatka, Fla., some two weeks or more ago, but getting separated from my baggage containing this manuscript copy—two of my grips having gone on to New Orleans—I postponed finishing the letter until I could recover what I had written. From various causes I did not recover this manuscript till the day of my departure from the Crescent City—too late for insertion in No. 757 of Lucifer.

My last letter for publication was sent from Palmetto, Fla., about one month ago. Taking leave—Saturday noon, March 18—of our good friends at that place, and turning my face once more towards the north star I had another very enjoyable ride over the smooth, clear waters of Tampa Bay. The boat—rightly named the "Margaret" (pearl)—was the same that had brought me from Tampa to Palmetto nearly a week before, and having to make a number of landings at the various small trading ports that line the bay, it was dark before we reached Port Tampa, ten miles from the city proper. At the railroad station I was again met by Friend H. J. Barksdale, whose acquaintance I had made on the train some weeks before, and who now informed me that arrangements were being made for a meeting at "Carpenter's Hall," Tampa, for Sunday evening.

Not feeling very strong I remained in my room most of the day Sunday, and when the hour for the meeting arrived I felt relieved rather than disappointed to find only a small audience to meet me at the hall. For some unexplained reason no announcement had been made of my lecture in the daily papers, as was promised, with the result that only a few labor reformers put in an appearance.

Intending to make but a short talk I began by reading an extract from the New York "Journal," in which the editor advises his readers to "Watch the trusts. Fight them when it comes to voting; fight them you must, since eventually the men who own them must be treated as pirates are treated usually. The owner of a trust, the manager of a trust, holds in slavery both man's necessities and his labor. Such a person must be done away with sooner or later. . . Eventually it may be necessary to hang a good many to stamp out the breed," etc., etc.

Commenting on these utterances of the "Journal" I took ground against "hanging" as a cure for the ills of our industrial system, saying, in substance, that "trusts" are the legitimate and necessary outgrowth of the competitive system, supplemented as that system is by "protective" privileges granted by law to certain lines of industry and supplemented also by a land-and-money system which practically says, "To him that hath it shall be given and he shall have abundance, but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he seemeth to have. The men who to-day own the trusts are as a rule, neither better nor worse than the men who cry out against them. If it were possible to persuade the voters of today to nationalize the trusts, the men who clamor for the change would want positions in the favored class, the official class, the governing class, and they would want large salaries for little work. Equality of opportunities, "Equal rights for all and privileges for none," is beyond the comprehension of the average reformer. That this is true is proved by the history of "strikes". The strikers demand a better adjustment for the wage system, not the abolition of the wage system. They do not want to own their time, their tools and an equal share in nature's undeveloped wealth. They are willing that the privileged few should own and control these. All that the striking workers ask or expect is a better adjustment of the yoke to their necks, with perhaps the addition of better and more frequent opportunities to get into the wage-owning class themselves.

Proceeding I tried to show that something else is necessary than simply a modification or revamping of the old monopolistic systems. No half way measures will ever remove the evils now complained of. Looking for fundamental causes I tried to show that the parent "trust," the trust of all trusts most harmful, is the marriage trust—the ownership and control of the "creatory" by priest and judge; the trust that denies to woman the ownership and control of her person; the trust that denies to children of the masses the natural right to be born well—to be born of love and to be reared in an atmosphere of love, as the first and chief condition or factor in the creation of a race of human beings wise enough and strong enough to change the industrial and financial systems that now enslave the producing masses in this and all other countries.

To secure this much desired revolution I maintained that woman must take the lead. That man's selfishness will never grant to woman the right of self ownership—the right of "Initiative and Referendum" in the creation of a new race—the creation of a new "dispensation," a new heaven and a new earth, in which "dwelleth righteousness," that is RIGHTNESS, which means justice, equity, fraternity, love and truth.

Replying to my statement that woman must take the lead in the reconstruction of human society—that the most effective of all strikes would be the "strike of a sex," Mr. J. C. Jeffcott said, in substance, that women are the "helpless sex." Women can never raise themselves from their present state of dependence upon man. This dependence is woman's normal condition. When she attempts the role of breadwinner she unsexes herself, and thereby loses the respect and love of man. This is illustrated by the well-known fact that to be a lady typewriter is regarded as equivalent to being a woman of "easy virtue."

"I once read," said Mr. Jeffcott, "a book called 'A Strike of a Sex'—one of the most silly, most impracticable and absurd things I ever read or heard of. Man's nature is aggressive, progressive, domineering, imperious,—man must be the leader, must be ruler. Woman's nature is passive, receptive, submissive, yielding,—women must be the subject sex, the dependent sex, in social and economic life. Man must boss the family. The man who cannot boss his family does not deserve the name of man," and much more in the same vein. Several others took part in the discussion, some siding with Mr. Jeffcott, others taking what may be termed middle ground.

In my closing remarks I said that while Mr. Jeffcott's statement as to the relative position of the sexes is largely true—true to fact, true to nature as we find it today—yet what has been true to fact and to nature in the past need not and will not always be so, will not always be right or normal. There is such a thing as evolution in human ethics as well as evolution in physical nature. Because man has dominated woman in all the past, does not prove that he will always rule and enslave her. Woman's dependence, woman's inferiority in the social and economic realm, has been largely because of her lack of strength and physical courage, and because she has been handicapped in the race for supremacy by her childbearing and by the care of children. After ages and ages of dumb submission and of voiceless suffering, woman is at length awaking to a sense of the wrongs that have been inflicted upon her, inflicted by man's selfish love of power and because of the unequal load placed upon her shoulders as builder of new human beings.

Woman, in all the past, has been "veiled and sleeping" because she "knew not her power, nor what was due to her as a human being, but now the veil is being removed from her eyes. Now she begins to look upon the problems of life from her own standpoint, instead of from the standpoint of a "lord and master." Though not yet strong enough nor brave enough to stand alone, to stand erect and to demand all the rights and privileges of a human being, she is no longer prone on the ground,—no longer is her body stretched upon the sands of the desert; already she has "risen to her knees," and she is now asking—of herself she is asking—"Might I not rise?"

Woman, some women, are now demanding rights of citizenship, demanding equal political rights with her brother, man, refusing longer to be considered a minor, refusing to be classed with idiots, with imbeciles, or with prison convicts because of her sex; and more important still—infinitely more important, she is now demanding the absolute ownership of her person, whether married or unmarried—including, of course, the right to be called by her own name, instead of by the name of the man who by law claims the right to own her person.

And while self-ownership is woman's first and supreme demand it is not her only demand. In order that self-ownership may be everywhere practicable woman demands a thorough reconstruction of our industrial and economic systems. She demands that the wage-slave system be abolished, and that in its stead a system of equitable co-operation and of equal right to the advantages conferred by labor-saving invention, be everywhere inaugurated. She demands that the claims of motherhood, that is, that woman's labor and time while devoted to the work of race-building and care of infant children should receive due recognition, due reward, as the most important of all human industries.

When womanhood and motherhood shall receive their due recognition in associative human life it is confidently believed that the first and most important step will have been taken towards removing the ills complained of by labor reformers and by all other societary and governmental agitators.

These are some of the views, thoughts, or opinions, presented for the consideration of the very earnest and intelligent labor reformers who met at "Carpenter's Hall," Tampa, Florida, on the night of Sunday, March 19, '98. Though few as to numbers it was one of the most interesting of the gatherings addressed by Lucifer's editor during his sojourn in the Palmetto State. Tampa is one of the largest cities in Florida and because of its prominence as a military post or rendezvous of United States soldiers during the late war with Spain, there are few Americans who have not heard of this town. The following are the names of some of the more prominent of Tampa reform workers: P. W. Knapp., J. W Jeffcott, J. C. Cameron, L. G. Denson, H. J. Barksdale, E. M. Pearsons, Capt. Burnham Nick Jacobson, R. Hanlon.

Leaving Tampa Monday morning, March 20, I returned to Kissimmee, and on Tuesday found my way to the Shaker colony near to Narcoossee, about ten miles eastward from Kissimmee. Was very kindly and hospitably entertained by Benjamin Gates, who seems to be the business manager of the colony, and of the other members thereof. This colony is not large (only some ten or twelve persons in all), but they seem to be quite prosperous in business, and appear happy and contented in their comparative isolation from the great outside world. Their principal industries are pine-apple growing, sugar-cane culture—from which they manufacture molasses only—and pasturing cattle for neighboring stock-growers. Those of our readers who may wish to know more of this experiment in colony life may address Andrew Barrett, Narcoossie, Fla., who will, as I feel assured, answer all letters that enclose a self-addressed and prepaid envelope.

Near this colony is another in which the mode of life and leading doctrines are very similar to those of the other Shaker colony, but whose members entertain somewhat different views as to government in this world and as to the meaning of "life after death." With Brother Roberts, who seems the leading spirit here, and others of the colony, I had a very pleasant visit of two hours or more, finding them to be persons of superior intelligence and culture. Though few in numbers they seem to have solved the industrial, social and religious problems of mortal life in a manner quite satisfactory to themselves.

Is There But One Way?

"The only real help to bestow on 'unfortunates' . . . . is to circulate the libertarian sentiments found in Lucifer and other radical papers," says Kate Austin. I agree with her that this is a very important help, but I cannot concede that it is the only help, nor that it is impossible to combine the teachings of Lucifer with other means of assistance. In fact, I do not believe that there is "only one way," of accomplishing any work. Different cases require different methods.

Yes, we should circulate Lucifer—I would gladly give many free copies to prospective mothers who would be willing to read them. But sympathetic personal talks need not lessen the influence of the printed page.

It is true that married women need sympathy and help. When did I ever deny it? I would help a married woman just as readily as one who may be unmarried, if she should appeal to me for help as unmarried women have done. Surely our friend does not think we can help only one class of women. The reason I wrote of unmarried mothers was I thought apparent in my words. Some of them feel disgraced, and want peace and quiet until after the baby is born, and peace and quiet is what they cannot have at home where they constantly meet the reproaches and scorn of their family and acquaintances. Perhaps they "ought" to be strong enough to endure it, but the fact remains that the majority are not, and many are driven to despair and suicide. Understand, I am not writing of those who intelligently and voluntarily assume motherhood outside of marriage but of the multitude who ignorantly do so, and so have to endure not only the condemnation of their friends, but self-condemnation. They need help to self-respect rather than material assistance. And that period can be made the most important turning point in a woman's life.

Yes, the next question is, "What of the child?"—and it is largely for the sake of the child that we should help the mother. Mrs. Austin has strangely misread me if she understood by my allusion to the common "lying-in hospitals" that I advocated the renunciation of her child by the mother. The answer to this question might be different in each case. The world is large, and the mother is not always obliged to go back to her old home. She may make new acquaintances, form new ties, find employment in the place in which the babe is born. Or she may have acquired the knowledge and courage necessary to take her baby back and be proud of it. If after all, she does not want it, if she thinks it a nuisance and wishes to rid herself of it, the best possible thing for the child would be to give it to some one who would love and care for it. Perhaps she "ought" to love and keep it; but even if she could be made to look on it as a duty, duty love is but a cold substitute for the genuine mother love, and it is most deplorable that any child must be brought up on it. Watered milk is fattening, in comparison.

In conclusion, I must say I am aware that I can do but little toward removing the monstrous mass of ignorance, prejudice and superstition which crushes women and through them the countless little ones yet unborn; but to the litt'e I can do I shall devote all the powers of heart and hand and brain. I believe in holding up the ideal of self-reliant womanhood, but if a woman is not strong enough to live up to that ideal—and the majority cannot even see it—I shall help her to be herself, in so far as I can do so, even if she cannot be as strong and free as my ideal. And I don't care whether women are married or single, old or young, black, white, yellow, or any of the colors of the rainbow, if I can help them to a place in which they can help themselves and their babies, I shall do it. I am quite sure such work need not interfere with that advocated by Mrs. Austin.

"Love Must Be Won."

In Lucifer I read the poem headed as above, and I thought how true that is, and passed judgment on it as very good.

Another day I picked up the paper and read "Love is not free to take like sun and air," and the thought occurred to me, Who ever took sun and air, and where did they take them? We may enjoy the sun and air by going where they are; we cannot take them in the way that we take anything else. We may remove things that shade the sun from us, so that its rays fall in our direction—we may also open our windows and let in the air; but fill a room full, then close the windows to enjoy your own room full of air, and how long can you keep it as fresh air?—surely a very short time, if you breathe it.

So instead of saying, "love is not free like sun and air," we should say, "it is free like sun and air." We may improve its light and warmth while it is day—we cannot take it, nor enclose it, nor keep it, nor give it away, any more than we can take, keep, or give away sun and air. We can build our houses in a way to receive little or much sun and air, so can we develop our natures to receive or give much love. Yet however well built are our houses, there are weeks of cloudy weather when we see no sunlight, and at other times our windows reveal to us the blinding lightning when it strikes our favorite tree. We are glad to shut out some air when hurricanes come, and however loving and lovely we may be, there will be lonely times when a lover is absent, or there is no love to meet our own; yet "some day" or on some days the sun will shine and love will comfort us—the sunlight and love which we might wholly shut out by wrong architectural design and an unlovely character.

Genuine Free Thought.

The "Truth Seeker," of Bradford, Eng., comes to us each month laden with good things. William Francis Barnard contributes a page to the April number, from which we quote:

Might does not make right. Nor does right (more's the pity) often make might.

If freethought does not imply free action, if it does not make for free action, what is the value of freethought?

The gods are not dead merely because one god is dead, religious superstition is only one among many superstitions.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again," says Bryant. Yes, and the crusher will be waiting for her when she rises.

"Whoso would be a man must be a non-conformist," says Emerson. Yes, but—whoso would be a nonconformist must first be a man.

A "freethinker" accosted a philosopher. "I am a freethinker," he proudly exclaimed.

"What do you think of free——"

"Bosh! They ought to be imprisoned."

W. MacQueen contributes a very important article on "Free-thought and Free Action." Among other articles are, "The Drama of Christianity," by Arthur B. Moss; "The Way from the Church," by Charles C. Cattell; "Clericalism and Militarism," by Edward Leggatt. These are but a few of the titles. The paper is very bright and interesting, and advocates free thought on all lines. We have a few extra copies, which we will send to any address for five cents each.

Homes.

BY EDGAR D. BRINKERHOFF.

The home has received another savage attack, this time directed by C. L. James. He says, "Homes are playing out." He thinks the restaurants, bakers cooking, laundries and so forth, mean, or look to, co-operative housekeeping. Some of the home haters should explain themselves. The central idea conveyed by the word home is that of a dwelling place. Do the opponents of homes think that dwelling places will soon be things of the past? Evidently this chief element is not the one to which the anti-homists are opposed, for dwelling places will continue to exist as long as man himself, except when he betakes himself to roaming like the Bedouin of the semi-desert. Possibly this is the only sense in which the home must go—to keep up with the wandering Arab who sets up a new home each day. Still the roaming one might keep a home some where to come to when his travels are over.

The home destroyers must mean that they expect the home of the future to evolve and take on new characteristics and lose some old traits. It is interesting to speculate as to what principle our homes are to surrender to make themselves acceptable to the home smashers. Mr James' intimation is that the individual is to give way to co-operative house-keeping. In a rough way this is true. The farmer no longer manufactures his own sugar and coats. He now buys these things ready made. In his housekeeping economy, these two branches of individual manufacturing have been represented by commercial transactions on his part, thus introducing the element of free co-operation. Free co-operative house-keeping changes the housekeeper's work from manufacturing to commerce. Individual manufacturing gives way to co-operative manufacturing, but the commercial part remains as nearly individual as the housekeeper's former work.

It is hardly probable that the mother and her children will in the future live without a home. It is not likely that they will live in some other person's home. Homes will be so easy to be had that they will live in homes of their own. They will shun the manufacturing part of the housekeeping, but the commercial part will be attended to by the mother. Families will not universally or even usually make their home in a hotel, because a small concern can always compete successfully against a large one under circumstances of freedom, which means that the mother will find attending to her own household affairs cheaper than hotel living. Her housekeeping will be co-operative so far as manufacturing is concerned. Her individual housekeeping, keeping her house in order as to those matters that can hardly be hired or bought and in such trade transactions as ordering goods and paying bills. She will keep a man boarder, but even he will not be homeless, for although his landlady will attend to what little housework developed industry requires, yet he will feel at home as he will pay for home comforts according to the terms agreed upon. Men will not own their own homes as, like hotels, they will not be able under freedom to compete with women in the housekeeping business.

"What Shall We Do With the Children?"

BY KATE AUSTIN.

The question, "What can we do for 'Unfortunates'"? will sooner or later lead to that other no less vital question "What will we do for the 'unfortunate's' child?" If the illegal mother is to be shielded from the consequences of her own act, the child must be hidden from those who move and "have their being" in that select circle to which the mother belongs. In order to do this, the babe, as soon as it is born, must be deprived of its mother, robbed of the natural right to lie in that mother's bosom, and forever doomed to remain in ignorance of its own parentage; that is, if it survive the cowardly cruelty of its own mother.

It is deplorable that a false moral code has so distorted woman's natural maternal instincts that she will avail herself, means permitting, of refuges in the city, "where women can remain during the periods of pregnancy and childbirth, and from which places she can have her baby adopted." The question is, ought we to encourage a woman to desert her offspring? Is it not better to arouse all the combativeness of which her nature is capable in order to meet that contemptible public opinion that demands nothing less of her than the desertion of her own child to appease its respectable maw?

The fact is, there is no place for a woman to hide. Sooner or later she must face the consequences of her own act, or do that which will cause life-long regret. Girls that have been "led astray," as a general rule, have plenty of relatives or friends who will see that they do not suffer, so far as material interests are concerned; they are as well off or better in that respect than the average married woman.

Those liberals who have replied so feelingly to the proposition will find ample room at home to exercise their benevolent faculties, and do not need to send abroad for subjects. The only way to alleviate the mental suffering of so-called "unfortunate" girls, is to cultivate their self-respect and common sense. By words and actions, show not only them but their neighbors, that you consider them every way your equal in true morality. Do not tolerate in silence the "holier than thou" feeling of prudes and hypocrites. It is easy to point to the generally well-born child of a lawless love as one blessed by nature, if cursed by man. Point out the frequent contrasts in favor of the illegal article compared with many legal specimens. Do all this and more, but do not encourage cowardice in the prospective mother. Suppose it possible, and she is gladly willing to "flee from the wrath to come." What then? After the child is born she must give it up to strangers or some "Home for Foundlings"—a deed that any self-respecting, healthy woman ought to consider the most shameful thing she could do—or return to her friends with the little infant in her arms and face the usual gossip and averted looks of those whose opinions and scorn she ought to have ignored in the first place. I have known more than one girl who has successfully "lived it down" in her own community, who has quietly and bravely faced what seemed to her the burden of a nameless sin, and at last found solace and peace in her love for her child. As one said to me:

"Before my child was born I shed many tears, but I thought if I am mean enough to bring one into the world I ought to be good enough to take care of it."

Can anything surpass the true morality and goodness embodied in that simple sentence, from the lips of a young and ignorant girl? Such as she need no refuge but their own self-reliance and courage, and it is needless to add that her child was mentally far above the average.

I think it perfectly safe to assert that in every neighborhood there are, on an average, more respectable women in dire need of sympathy and a home for themselves and children than there are among the "unfortunates." The only real help to bestow on "unfortunates" of all classes and sexes is to circulate the true libertarian sentiments found in Lucifer and the various radical papers.

Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets.

Stories of fascinating interest collected and narrated by S. Baring-Gould. They relate to the fall of the angels, the creation of man, the giants, the flood, and very many other subjects, giving the Jewish and "heathen" versions. 380 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth. Price, postpaid, 90 cents.

VARIOUS VOICES.

L. K., Wall street, Colo.—I enclose twenty-five cents to apply on my subscription to Lucifer. I am inclined to think that short stories would be a taking idea in your paper. I know that I have enjoyed the reading of one or two that have appeared lately, and I am inclined to think that stories "point the moral" just a little better, if anything, than do columns of dry argument and altercations between persons, of which there is too much to suit my taste in Lucifer. People, as a rule, do not care what this or that person thinks, but they do heed and remember a good point pressed well home in a story. Try the idea.

E. H., Ohio.—I see by your letter in Lucifer (viz. "What Can We Do for 'Unfortunates'?") that you have heard from six states, of people who are willing to give a helping hand to those in need. Therefore if you can give me the address of one in this state who is willing to help a woman out of her difficulty in this direction, you will confer a favor upon one in need of a home during accouchement; could pay about $1.50 or $2 per week.

[Ohio is one of the states which I have not heard from. Yet we have a considerable number of women subscribers in that state, and it is possible that one may be willing to consider receiving E. H. in her home. If any will, I hope she will write to me. I will place them in communication with E. H. L. H.]

Alfreda, Thayer, Miss.—I have read and re-read what Mr. Walker had to say in No. 753, and think such articles are just what we need for propaganda work. If the masses could only be convinced that most of their sufferings are caused by their own ignorance in regard to intimate social relations and by their false modesty in not being willing to discuss these matters in the serious and candid manner their importance demands, how much of human misery might be avoided. I sometimes speak so plainly in defence of unfortunate women who are attacked by my own sex, that my lady friends look amazed. One old lady, otherwise kind-hearted, said to me lately, "Why, we have to ostracise men and women when they don't come up to our standard, or more would go astray than they do now. We must vigorously hate vice, or we can but tamely love virtue." As these women were all orthodox, I quoted the alleged saying of the Nazarene on a certain occasion, and our little gathering looked thoughtful, for a short time at least.

Lydia R. Todd, R. 21, 415½ S. Spring St., Los Angeles, Cal. .....Now in regard to the article you have in the paper about the young girl who had been "betrayed" and therefore supposed to be "ruined," finding a friend in other women. I will just say that in me all women have a friend, and anything I can do to help them I am more than willing to do. Of course I cannot do a very great deal, as I have only what I earn by day's work, aside from a little property from which I get little except tax receipts. I am much obliged to you for publishing my letter, but am sorry that you did not give my name in full. I always sign myself so. I never hesitate to say just what I think, and would do so if I knew that I would go to prison. I have made lots of enemies and some friends by being outspoken. I cannot help it, I must do as I think right and I am willing to take the consequences.

[Some people object to having their names published in Lucifer, so unless I feel reasonably sure that the writer does not object, I suppress the name when I insert extracts from letters which are not plainly written for publication. Often people ask for addresses which I do not feel at liberty to give without permission. If our friends, when writing to the office, would say how they feel in regard to this matter, they would help me very much. L. H.]

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

At last we have a cheap and good American edition of this incomparable creation of the Astronomer-Poet of Persia, as rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Once read, "The Rubaiyat" is read again and again and each time with new insight and delight.

It is the wish of Swinburne that the rich gift of Omar Khayyam of Naish apur may "be tasted in that most exquisite English translation, sovereignly faultless in form and color of verse, which gives to those ignorant of the East a relish of the treasure and a delight in the beauty of its wisdom." With sketch of Omar's life. Symbolical cover. Price 10 cents. Address M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive chords in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

The following by WILLIAM DENTON, pioneer Freethought and Spiritualist lecturer, and naturalist, who died while on a journey of scientific research in the wilds of Australia some fifteen years ago, are of as vital importance now as when they were written:

Sermons from Shakespeare's Text:
"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything."
Orthodoxy False, Since Spiritualism is True.
The God Proposed for Our National Constitution.
What is Right?
Man's True Saviors.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 173 pages. Price 25 cents.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 20 cts per dozen.

KAREZZA Ethics of Marriage. A bold, brave book teaching ideal marriage, rights of the unborn child, a designed and controlled maternity.
"Union Signal": Thousands of women have blessed Dr. Stockham for Tokology, thousands of men and women will bless her for Karezza.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 286 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Ideala was a woman too thoughtful, too honest, too true for the conventional "middle class" English society in which she lived. Her life story furnishes much food for thought for those who like to study the facts of life when disguised as fiction. 195 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth, with silver lettering. Price, postpaid, 35 cents.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

Love's Infidelities.

I tell thee, Charmion, could I time retrieve,
And could again begin to love and live,
To you I should my earliest offering give;
I know my eyes would lead my heart to you,
And I should all my vows and oaths renew;
But, to be plain, I never would be true.

For by our weak and weary truth I find
Love hates to center in a point assigned:
But runs with joy the circle of the mind:
But let us never chain what should be free,
But for relief of either sex agree,
Since women love to change, and so do we.
—Jonathan Swift.

Mary Shelley.

BY C. L. JAMES.

It would scarcely be possible to imagine a feminine nature more unlike my first heroine's than my second, though there doubtless are still in the world Philistines who would bracket them together as "erring women." Each is the central figure of a drama. But Catherine, emerging from the darkness of her origin like lightning from a thundercloud, forces herself into startling prominence. Mrs. Shelley, who habitually suppressed herself, is not easily given her due place among the tragic figures of that stage in which she moved.

Unlike Catherine, she had ancestors. Her mother, Mary Wollstonecraft, became immortal through writing "A Vindication of the Rights of Women." Her father, William Godwin, will always be remembered as the man whose "Political Justice" called forth the famous essay of Malthus. The character of both contributed to form hers.

Mrs. Wollstonecraft, whose capacity for affection and devotion made her loved by all who knew her, was evidently of an impulsive disposition, unregulated by good training, for she had none.

Godwin possessed no common imagination, as shown by his romances, "Caleb Wilhams" and "St. Leon," but it was untinged by a particle of emotion. His merits and faults, as artist, philosopher and private person, all alike turn about a single point—the utter coldness of his logical vigorous spirit. The only passion of his long life was Mary Wollstonecraft, who lived with him but a year.

Mary Wollstonecraft's father had been a man of dissipated habits and a violent temper. Her mother, whom Mary and her sister Eliza encouraged to obtain a separation, was, until then, the passive victim of his caprices. But it may be mentioned that the daughter's view of women's rights had nothing to do with suffrage, did not involve a formal attack on marriage or Christianity, and was probably not meant for any such thing. It was Godwin whose uncompromising logic made their daughter an anarchist and free lover before, at less than seventeen, she startled him by an unexpected application of his principles.

The thesis of Mary Wollstonecraft's book (dedicated to Talleyrand) was simply this: that since woman is the chief educator of youth, she must herself have all the moral and intellectual advantages of man, else her influence will always be a destructive drag on human progress. In working out the conclusions from this obvious premise, Mrs. Wollstonecraft spoke plainly. In a Comstockian age she might probably have been imprisoned. Under the more guarded tyranny of Pitt, the obscene among her contemporaries could only revile her—which they did most characteristically.

At Paris, during the Reign of Terror, she married, under the laws of that distracted period, an American named Imlay, by whom she had a daughter Fanny. After many separations, of which his "unfaithfulness" was a part cause, she finally left her husband and attempted to destroy herself at London in 1795. This was nearly the beginning of her acquaintance with Godwin. Fanny Inlay killed herself with laudanum October, 1816—no cause absolutely known but melancholy, which may have been inherited. Mary Godwin (Shelley) was born at the end of August, 1797. Her mother died September 10.

"They say that thou wert lovely at thy birth,
Of glorious parents, thou aspiring child.
I wonder not—for one then left this earth
Whose life was like a setting planet mild,
Which clothed thee in the radiance undefiled
Of its departing glory; still her fame
Shines on thee through the tempests dark and wild
Which shake these latter days.

Mary Wollstonecraft in youth had been appreciated by so conservative a mentor as Samuel Johnson. But the tempests were truly dark and wild, her fame still visible only to a discerning few when Shelley addressed her daughter thus. A generation had passed away ere Tennyson wrote beside her tomb this cautious eulogy:

"Now is done thy long day's work,
Fold thy palms across thy breast,
Fold thine arms, turn to thy rest
Let them rave.

. . . . . .

Wild words wander here and there
God's great gift of speech abused
Makes thy memory confused
But let them rave."

"For the good of his children" Godwin took another mate whom her literary friends agreed in disliking. She is suspected of underlying Fanny Imlay's fate, undoubtedly predisposed Mary to what Mary's father considered a rash step, and her daughter, Mrs. Clairmont, became the mother of Byron's illegitimate child, Allegra.

Of Mary's flight with Shelley July, 1814, the immediate cause is that her father had very decidedly interfered with their intimacy, which was only forty days old. As usual, his reasons for his conduct are much more creditable to his general good sense than his capacity for that special discernment which depends on sympathy. They resolve themselves into this, that Shelley, though already deserted by his wife (March of the same year) was married. The simple reason why this "cut no figure" we will let Shelley himself state.

> "True love in this, differs from gold and clay,
> That to divide is not to take away.
> Like ocean, which the general north wind breaks
> Into ten thousand waves, and each one makes
> A mirror of the moon—like some great glass,
> Which did distort whatever form might pass,
> Dasht into fragments by a playful child,
> Which then reflects its eyes and forehead mild;
> Giving for one, which it could ne'er express,
> A thousand images of loveliness."

Though the unfortunate Harriet was no companion for him he always desired a reunion with her. It was she who would not have it. She believed in divorce and remarriage—she formed another connection before her death—she did not believe in variety.

Mary confesses some jealousy of Harriet, of Mrs. Clairmont and of Emilia Viviani, to whom the last quoted lines were addressed, but she considered these unworthy feelings. That she entertained them means that she was Godwin's and Mary Wollstonecraft's daughter. That she held them under means that she loved and comprehended Shelley. For in truth Shelley's qualities were all as unlike Godwin's and Mary Wollstonecroft's as possible. Mary Wollstonecraft was explosive. Shelley, though irritable, had self-restraint. Godwin's insensibility to persons made his anarchism powerless against Malthus, who knew men. It was to Shelley, not Godwin, of whom he imagined him a disciple, that anarchism meant unchecked development of the spirit.

> "The man
> Of virtuous soul commands not, nor obeys.
> Power, like a desolating pestilence,
> Pollutes whate'er it touches; and obedience,
> Bane of all genius, virtue, freedom, truth
> Makes slaves of men, and of the human frame
> A mechanized automaton."

Shelley rewarded the love of Mary by calling forth her genius. Yet it may have been the destiny of his fame to cast a shadow over her's. The author of "Frankenstein" had no idea of her own powers. It was Shelley who stimulated her to this effort, so extraordinary in a girl of eighteen. Having made it, she appears henceforth as his satellite. But she had some reasons for being satisfied with that. She was a critic whom he would have done well to let guide him more. She knew, as he did not, that the author of "The Cenci" does himself injustice when he dissolves in rainbows and the odor of sweet flowers. As his editor and biographer she has forever entwined her fame with his—for his fame was by no means established before his death. Her's was. The tremendous motifs of "Frankenstein"—the inexorableness of past actions, the Nemesis of presumption, the contagion of injustice, the dependence of human sensibilities on the senses in which they vegetated—these, and the dramatic form into which she cast them, would have insured her immortality had she not been Psyche to his Eros. But how little we should have known then about the limpid purity, the angelic sweetness of this spirit before which slander itself has fallen like the serpent blinded by the emerald's light.

Freedom has been associated by others with morality, with expediency, with reason, with power. It was reserved for her to identify this most sacred and most blasphemed of liberties, eternally with beauty. She had a very difficult task.

Shelley, whose only real fault was callowness—he was but twenty-nine when he died—had been painted by the ghouls of respectability as a monster. The great works which contain his vindication were as yet but little read. His literary friends, as Byron, Hunt and Trelawney were themselves too much under the ban to be his sponsors. She on whom it devolved was, according to vulgar misapprehension, the cause and partner of what was supposed to be his crime. It would doubtless be far too much to say that her success though astonishing, is complete. Her editing of his poems is in some respects, notoriously defective. In encyclopædias and other manuals of popular misinformation, we may still, at least sometimes, read such fictions as that Shelley deserted Harriet to run away with her. But this much she effected—that Shelley's complete works are known to every reader of English, and that even the obscene have ceased to blame her. This involves her husband's triumph; for to acquit her, and read him and condemn him are three things which will not go together. Moreover, she placed the monument which she erected upon immovable foundations.

Boswell is the king of biographers, made so by his veracity and loyalty, but he lacked tact. Mary Shelley did not want tact, yet she is as candid as Boswell. She left for publication which is now made, every fragment of the facts about Sheller. But she selected for immediate use what was suitable to the time. No one who has read Dowden's voluminous work will doubt that she did well. We read in Dowden such things as how the prudent Godwin received money from his wayward daughter and son-in-law, while refusing to see them till they were white-washed. It would be pleasanter not to know. But in all the new information there is nothing to take from our personal esteem for Shelley or Mrs. Shelley, and not much to augment it except her previous reticence.

Husband and Wife Partnership.

BY EDGAR D. BRINKERHOFF.

In comparing the views of radicals with those of their fellow radicals, we are often forcibly reminded that many are yet in the second stage defined by Spencer, when he observed that the unanimity of the ignorant is followed by the disagreement of the inquiring, and that this in turn is followed by an improved unanimity, namely, that of the wise. From the utter condemnation of the home on the part of some radicals, we turn to the other extreme, in which it is advocated that in the co-partnership entered into between man and woman everything should be held in common. This idea is frequently met with. Says Argo in the April 22 Lucifer:

"Man [in the best sense] considers the woman whom the law calls his wife, his partner having equal rights in all things, business matters as well as social affairs. He recognizes her right to dissolve that co partnership whenever she may choose to do so; to have and to hold one-half of the co-partnership property in her own right."

This is domestic communism with a vengeance. But if common ownership did not work in the Jamestown colony why expect it to work in the family? It is safe to say that when we become wise enough to be unanimous once more we will agree that, in the ideal family, each piece of property will belong to one member, not to the members in common. Let the business belong to the man as a general thing. Let the household goods belong usually to the woman. The man will attend to business affairs, the woman to household affairs. Both will have an opportunity under freedom to increase in property. The man will get profits or rather wages from his business. The woman will have a source of income if she lives with a man that is not merely her husband. What man would pay her less than her services were worth? Knowing that the (future) law gives her no claim on his property, she will not squander the surplus remaining after household expenses are paid. The amount to be contributed for household expenses by the man will be very precisely determined in a free market. When a co-partnership is dissolved each takes his or her own property; there is nothing to divide, nothing to disagree about, use for the courts only in exceptional cases. The progress from the family holding everything in common, to the free family, is an advance in which organs become more specialized and functions further differentiated.

We often magnify troubles and difficulties and look at them until they seem greater than they really are. Foresight is very wise but foresorrow very foolish, and castles at any rate better than dungeons in the air.—Sir John Lubbock, M. P.

The Unanswerable Question.

DEAR LILLIAN: Some months ago, perhaps a year or more, when your correspondents and yourself were writing of the propriety of telling children "the why and the wherefore" of babies in their first visits to life, I felt inclined to send you a "recollection" of my difficulties in that matter when a child of seven years of age, but your pages are crowded, and one correspondent is afraid that another should have more room, etc., and I am a stranger to most of your patrons, and am of very little consequence, and once again age is apt to write at too much length.

I will write you the recollection—if you can use it all right, if not, more than all right. Here it is:

A REMINISCENCE.

The little farming town of my residence when a child was full of bigots, and one of the members of the church was a young man with a wife and baby; living with them was a young girl of fifteen years of age who called them uncle and aunt—I do not know about the relation. This girl gave birth to a baby, but she would not give the doctor the name of the father, as she said she "promised Uncle Phin she wouldn't."

I heard a great deal said about the affair in a blind way, but I couldn't make out about it. I got courage at last to ask my aunt who was in place of a mother, and belonged to the same church (Presbyterian) with "Uncle Phin."

"Did God make all babies?"

"Certainly," she answered, "he makes everybody, he makes everything."

"Then," said I, "why was it wicked for Sarah Webb to have a baby?"

Poor, dear auntie, she was the best woman I ever knew, but she could only say, "I can't tell; you must wait till you are older."

LUCY N. COLMAN.

A Woman Proud of Maternity.

While coming home from teaching last Wednesday I saw a very unusual, and to me a beautifully impressive sight.

Two of my sisters, who are also my pupils, were with me, when one of them said as a woman entered the car,

"There is a lady without corsets—see how nicely she is dressed."

I glanced up, and as the woman walked past I observed her closely. She was elegantly dressed in silk and lace. Her dress cleared the floor nearly three inches. She seated herself almost facing us, and I noticed that her shoes had low heels. She was probably twenty years of age; and as I admired her happy face I observed that she would soon become a mother. A baby on its mother's lap across the car from her seemed to interest her. She would look at it and smile, then she leaned her head against the window and closed her eyes a moment, and an expression of contentment and satisfaction settled on her face, while her lips seemed almost ready again to break into a smile. It was plainly to be seen that in fancy she was proudly holding her own babe in her arms, while lovingly gazing in its up-turned face. Only the mother of welcome children can understand the happiness to be found in such dreams.

My sister remarked how seldom it is that a pregnant woman appears proud and happy. Long will this face remain with me, a pleasant memory. Desired motherhood accompanied by the judgment to dress in a way to enable the mother to enjoy the baby's presence before birth and permit its free development is so rare that it does one good to witness it. This woman was so quiet and modest that had I not been a student of physical development I would not have noticed her.

If women were more observant of such things they would learn to live sensible, beautiful lives, instead of imitating any ugly fashion that is presented in the papers. Worth would be obliged to combine comfort and beauty in his designs or they would be worthless to him. Motherhood would lose many of its terrors and joy would be written on the faces of expectant mothers, where often we see only pain.

M. FLORENCE JOHNSON.

A Sanctified Wife-Murderer.

"Jewell," in "Truth Seeker."

I take the following from a late issue of the Detroit "Journal:"

"John M. Dean, a confirmed member of the Holy Trinity Catholic church of Detroit, pleaded guilty to the charge of 'feloniously assaulting and murdering his wife' on March 20, 1899. His wife was a pronounced Freethinker, and burial services were conducted in accordance with her belief."

If Dean should be hung for his crime he doubtless will repeat the language of Merritt of Indiana on a like occasion, who said he was sorry his wife was not prepared to meet him in heaven.

Freedom of the Press.

Townshend on "Libel and Slander," says: "Whatever else may be intended by the phrase 'freedom of the press' or 'liberty of the press,' it means the freedom or liberty of those who conduct the press. . . . The liberty of the press is connected with natural liberty. The use and liberty of speech were antecedent to Magna Charta, and printing is only a more extensive and improved kind of speech. The liberty of the press, therefore, properly understood, is the personal liberty of the writer to express his thoughts in the more improved way invented by human ingenuity in the form of press. The liberty of press consists in the right to publish with impunity truth with motives and for justifiable ends whether it respects governments, magistracy or individuals.

* * * * *

"Save good faith there is no limit to criticism concerning a man's actions or his creations. 'God forbid,' exclaimed Baron Alderson, 'that you should not be allowed to comment on the conduct of all mankind provided you do it justly and honorably.'"

Look to the End.

By the light of hist ry's pages
Travel back the past dead ages;
Ever find the tragic story telling just the same:
Man in bloodiest war engages;
Tortures, burns and kills the sages;
Ever stained with blood and crime and lust of power and fame.

Who can answer, who can say
Man is wiser, now, today,
Than when Egypt's Pharoah's lived and reigned on earth?
Pose the State's or Church's sway
Offer any nobler way?—
Are not countless millions doomed to wretchedness from birth?

The world is ruled by millionaires;
The cross of Christ no message bears—
Throws but a blighting shadow everywhere o'er life:
The rulers claim all that is theirs
The toiler's harvest—all but the tares!—
Where do history's pages show base robbery more rife?

Lust of gold, of power athirst,
This Man's history from the first—
Ever since the written record was begun on stone or skin:
Ever making gods the worst
Reflect all his deeds accurst;
Showing by his worshipped gods how poor Man's life has been.

High the towers and steeples rise
Of churches mocking fairest skies—
But within does right word spoken ever greet the ear?
And with every hour that flies
The church all freedom o'er denies—
The cross crowned Church holds jangling priest—no prophet, poet, seer.

Ever chained by superstition;
Ever slaves to old tradition,—
So the toilers of the world build here on earth their hells:
Seemingly without volition,
Witless in self-wrought perdition—
O, for this sad inanition be there word or spell!

Unnumbered slaves of every nation;
Of archetype lies their adoration;
It would not seem a grievous wrong their choice to dwell in hell—
But that the coming generation
May wallow in the same stagnation;
They suicide as well as ring the little children's knell.

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 507 CARROLL AVE., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, William Duff, 9 Carfin St., Glasgow Scotland.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents.

THE TRIAL of Walter Hurt, editor of the "Gatling Gun," Cleveland, Ohio, has been postponed to the September term of court. In the May number of the "Gatling Gun" the indicted articles are named, I have looked up the articles and read them. I do not, of course, know what effect they may have had on other readers, but I could see nothing obscene in them. I could criticise them at length for other features which do not please me; but so far as I am aware, the "Gatling Gun" is not published especially to please the taste of Lillian Harman, so I shall refrain from such criticism here. I hope, however, that the lovers of fair play will send ten cents for a sample copy, or one dollar for a year's subscription, and judge for themselves the character of the paper. L. H.

Florida Gleanings.

THAYER, MISS., April 27, '99.

Having once more reached a quiet retreat, or haven, in which I can feel that my time is my own, I will now try to finish the promised report of observations and experiences during my two months sojourn in the peninsula of Florida.

As before stated in these letters, I regard Osceola county, Fla., as possessing many advantages, and as offering many inducements to homeseekers. For further information I feel safe in recommending all interested to write to our friends and subscribers A. J. Gardner and J. B. Steffee, of Kissimmee, the county seat, and also to Postmaster Simpson of the same place, or to C. P. Prevatt, Sheriff of Osceola county, none of whom, they tell me, have lands for sale.

As to healthfulness, Mr. Simpson is authority for the statement that since 1886 the death record of pupils attending public school at Kissimmee shows but two deaths in all for the twelve years. The average attendance of pupils at this school is upwards of two hundred. It is claimed that Florida ranks among the very healthiest of American states, the United States census for 1890 showing a death rate of 11.72 per cent., as against 13.11 per cent for Colorado, and 13.33 for California, the two states commonly reckoned as most healthful.

Once more bidding good-bye to our friends, the Steffees, to whom I feel under lasting obligations for hospitality and for many kind attentions, I returned March 22 to the camp at Lake Helen and found most of the cottages deserted and the big hotel closed for the summer. My trip to Southern Florida seems not to have been helpful to me as a health-seeker. Whether it was owing to my own indiscretions as to diet, or to the excitement of the Sunday night meeting at Tampa I know not, but certain it is that on reaching camp I felt compelled to stop and rest from Wednesday till the next Monday. During this enforced delay I was kindly and hospitably cared for by Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Buddington, of Springfield, Mass., who own one of the best cottages at the "Southern Cassadaga" camp. For several years H. A. Buddington has organized or managed winter excursions for tourists from the northeastern states to Florida. Friend Buddington is an author and publisher of books. Prominent among the books and pamphlets brought out by his publishing house are the somewhat famous "Bowles' Pamphlets," giving an account of the "Experiences of Samuel Bowles, Late Editor of the Springfield (Mass.) 'Republican,' in Spirit Life—or Life as He Now Sees it from a Spiritual Standpoint. Written through the Mediumship of Carrie E. Twing of Westfield, New York." There are five or six of these pamphlets, and while I do not wish to enter upon a discussion concerning the truth or falsity of the philosophy or the phenomena now known as Spiritualistic, I feel free to say that these pamphlets are to me very interesting reading. Whatever the source may be of the doctrines advanced, or of the ethics inculcated in these pamphlets, I think it must be conceded by every reader that these doctrines are, in the main, eminently natural, rational, and in line with the ideas taught by the leaders in modern scientific research.

From Lake Helen I came to Palatka, an old town situated on the St. Johns river, about fifty miles south of Jacksonville. Here I found myself very much at home in the family of our old-time friends and subscribers, the Downings. Many of our readers will doubtless recall the name W. S. Downing as a contributor to Lucifer's columns. The history of the experiences of this veteran in reform work, and those of Mrs. Downing and of their large family of children, in their attempts to solve the industrial and economic problems in California, Georgia and Florida, would make a most interesting and useful volume. Though physically unable to make a full hand at ordinary labor, W. S. Downing is mentally a very active man, and while his sons have been employed in the Palatka lumber mills he has elaborated a plan for the winter protection of orange trees and of other tender fruit trees and shrubs that it is confidently believed will be worth many millions of dollars annually to the people of the Palmetto state.

Of those at Palatka who take an active interest in our work and are readers of Lucifer, I will take the liberty to mention Mrs. Hinda Nugent, photographer; Mr. C. N. Brown, engineer of the Selden Sash and Door Manufactory, and Dr. J. A. Hall, an old physician who has for many years made stirpiculture, or homo-culture a special study.

Wednesday, March 29, I had a very enjoyable steamboat ride from Palatka to Jacksonville, on that majestic and unique river, the St. Johns. Unlike most American rivers it flows from south to north. Though not to be compared to the Mississippi or Missouri in length it is, for most of its course, a much wider and deeper stream. The chief item of commerce connected with this river is the lumber business, especially the cypress lumber business—its shores and the swamps contiguous thereto affording almost inexhaustible supplies of that timber. One of the most interesting incidents of my week at Palatka was a visit to the Wilson Cypress Company's mill. Having had some experience in the lumber business some thirty-five years ago in Southern Missouri I was amazed to see the improvements since then made in the methods of handling the logs—if indeed it be not a misnomer to call the processes of manufacture handling, when nearly everything is done by steam and by labor-saving machinery.

Arriving at Jacksonville I was very agreeably surprised to be met at the landing by Bro. Gardner of Kissimmee, who was staying temporarily with our Jacksonville friends and who piloted me to the home of Adeline Champney, her sister Ina, and of Henry Thayer. Very different was the temperature on this balmy April eve from what it was on my first visit to Jacksonville, when the temperature registered ten degrees above zero—the coldest weather ever known to the oldest inhabitants, so said. Here I remained two nights and one day—the last eve of my stay at this home of progressive thought being made memorable by a parlor meeting at which I made the personal acquaintance of several friends and old-time readers of Lucifer. Of these I wish here to mention the names of F. H. and Mrs. Barnard, and of Mrs. and Mr. Foster, whose initials I have not now at hand. Was urged to stay another day in order to meet a number of people who, as Bro. Barnard assured me, were much interested in Lucifer's line of work, but having already tarried in Florida much longer than at first intended I bade our new-found helpers a regretful and yet hopeful farewell, and next morning took train for New Orleans—stopping one night for rest, at the old town founded by the Spaniards and named by them Pensacola, I reached the chief city of the Gulf States without accident Saturday evening, April 8. M. HARMAN.

"What Will Become of the Children?"

This is the question which is always asked, and which is confidently expected to settle the discussion of freedom in sexual relations. It is assumed that women, in freedom, will bear as many undesired children for whom no provision has been made as married women bear when they believe that the marriage ceremony will in some mysterious way insure them against disease, death and poverty.

"What of the children?" we, too, ask, when the woman bears more than she can care for, and her husband deserts her, or loses his employment, or becomes an invalid, or dies. As a case in point I will quote from a letter which I have just read. It was written by a conservative woman to her cousin. Doubtless she would be shocked by the teachings of Lucifer if she should ever see it, and would probably ask, "But if men and women were not married, what would become of the children?"

"I have had a hard time, and much sickness. The doctors said they thought the most trouble was that I had worked too hard. My husband died ten years ago and I was left with eight children and all very small. The eighth was not born until three months after his death. So you see I had to do the best I could—and nothing to do with. It seems the doctors havn't done me much good, so I thought I would try a remedy that has been recommended to me. But it costs $2 and I don't know if the time will ever come when I get that amount ahead, as I am not able to do more than three washings a week, and my expenses are pretty high. Rent and wood cost me $5 a month, while my income is only $8 a month with four in family. I will be forty-two years of age next September."

And this is not even an unusual case. I know many such. This woman taught school in a country district when she was only fifteen. The letter bears evidence of a mind with aspirations towards culture and refinement. Think of the tragedy of such a life—a constant struggle for the bare existence of herself and her children!

How much the worse would have been her lot in life had she continued to teach and study until she had acquired an education, and then have borne a child, or even two or three? At the worst she could have supported them with more ease than she has fed and sheltered her eight. But one child born outside of marriage would probably have seemed to her a sign of eternal disgrace, though her eight children, to whom must be denied all but the barest existence, are, she perhaps thinks, merely a "dispensation of Providence."

"What is to become of children" born and reared under such conditions? L. H.

A Noble Woman.

It gives me pleasure to have a few words from Lucy N. Colman once more. Hers is one of the rare personalities that never seem to grow old. Though she has lived nearly eighty-two years, her mind is vigorous and she has lost none of her interest in the pressing problems of life. Her memory is a treasure house of stories of the anti-slavery struggle—a struggle in which she was one of the most earnest and powerful participants.

At twenty-six she became a mother, and of this experience she wrote: "I always like to write the word Mother with a capital M. To me it is the most wonderful word in all the language; it means joy that can never be equaled. I can never forget the ecstacy that that came over me when I first looked in the face of my child and knew that it was mine, but with the joy came the remembrance of the slave mother's agony as she looked upon her child and knew its fate."

To this daughter she gave the name I now bear, and she once told me that this coincidence helped me to win a place in her heart with her lost Lillian.

I shall never forget a little visit she paid us as Crescent Beach, near Boston, the summer in which my little daughter was journeying "Out of the Nowhere into Here." I had admired her for years, but had never seen her, and wondered if her personality would prove disappointing. When our eyes met in the first glance, I knew that she could be disappointing to no one. Bright, clear, kindly eyes looked out from a strong face whose every line expressed power and goodness. White curls, falling in the fashion of the "long ago" formed a fitting framework to the grand old face. She kept us charmed with her interesting words, and we were loth to let her go. She is one of the rare women whose very presence is a source of comfort and strength. Her influence for good has been incalculable and she has earned her rest; but when at last she lies down to sleep we who love her will sadly miss her, for we will know that a tower of strength has been laid low. Such women are all too few.

I cannot close these remarks more fittingly than with a few sentences of the tribute paid Lucy N. Colman by Samuel P. Putnam in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought:"

"Mrs. Colman is radical in every direction. She is opposed to white slavery as well as to black slavery, and has devoted herself to woman's rights as to the rights of man. She is a radical Freethinker, having outgrown superstition of every kind. She has not lost her interest in any living question. She has had a busy and eventful career; has mingled with the world, among its great characters and great movements, and has done her share to bring about the great gains of the present time. She has shown what a woman can do who has self-reliance, energy and devotion to truth and right. Her name shines in the annals of progress." L. H.

Why the Difference?

Estella Baker.

They were twins—both rosy and plump, but she rather more robust of the two.

They were popping corn on the kitchen stove. Every now and then a kernel popped out of the popper on the stove, where it perished, to the regret of the children. Suddenly a score did what they had many precedents for doing—leaped from bondage to death. The children could not permit all that destruction without some effort to prevent it, so both reached out a hand to save a few kernels and each hand obtained—a burn. Both children started, crying, to the sitting-room to tell their father, who sat reading; but Nellie's dress catching on the oven door, Ned reached him first with his tale of woe.

"Well, my son," said the father, as he looked up from his magazine, "you have learned that a hot stove burns."

As Ned crept into a corner, blowing his smart, Nellie arrived on the scene, and, climbing into her father's lap, rained tears on his open book as she said: "It hurts awfully, papa."

And her father said, "It's a naughty stove to burn my little girl;" and kissed the little fingers.

Ned hated his father and hated Nellie—for an hour.

Nellie had a reason for avoiding contact with a hot stove, but Ned had two.

Ned and Nellie had each a "flyer" which would fly down a snow-covered hill, but not up. On one of their flying trips they espied at the foot of the hill a man coming toward them, and Ned steering his flyer to the right and Nellie guiding hers to the left, essayed to encircle him, instead of which each appropriated one of his legs, which caused him to entirely envelope them both. When the man regained his feet he had both acquired and lost—acquired a very red face and lost his cane. He quickly found the latter without relinquishing the former, and gave the flattened Ned three energetic strokes before he could make himself cylindrical enough to roll out of the way. Then he turned to the frightened Nellie, saying, "Poor little girl, I hope I did not seriously hurt you. Take this nickel and run across the street and get you some candy."

Ned ever looked carefully about before he took a fly down the hill, but Nellie—well it would be absurd to say that candy isn't a bit like a pickle.

One day Ned lay back in his yellow cart driving his beloved Punch along Oak avenue. He didn't hate his father, or Nellie or anybody. The clouds seemed so friendly up in the blue sky, and the castles up there were so beautiful and real too—he knew he could make them real. He would be great, but he would be kind and helpful to all who were not great; he would forgive injury, and nothing but peace should dwell——

His head was nearly snapped off backwards. Punch was rearing, and another horse was trying to break its halter. The wheels of his cart were locked into those of the carriage attached to the other horse. A policeman, No. 46, ran up and jerked Punch back by the bit, hurting his mouth awfully, Ned knew, and then No. 46 struck Punch on the nose so that it brought tears to Ned's eyes, and ended by saying, "You little idiot, don't you know anything? Go home and tell your mother to put long dresses on you."

But that wasn't all. Ned remembered that last week he and Nellie were out in the same cart, and Nellie was driving just as he was today, that is, not driving at all, when they were suddenly jerked back by this same No. 46 just as a street-car swept by, and No. 46 had said to Nellie, "Excuse me, little lady, if I gave you a start, but there was no time to speak." And when Nellie thanked him he had answered, "Nothing but my duty, Miss."

And Nellie believed this.

Ned, remembering this, resolved that he would adopt dresses for his future clothing, short ones now and long ones later on.

Nellie, with the bright face of seventeen and its soft brown eyes, round red cheeks, full smiling mouth, curling locks on brow and temples, and all framed with a large dark blue velvet hat, stepped into the First National Bank to get a check cashed. The cashier handed her a fifty-dollar bill. She started to put in her purse, then hesitated, saying,

"Would it be too much trouble to give me five tens instead of this?"

"No trouble at all; delighted to do it," answered the cashier, as he handed her five ten-dollar gold pieces.

Nellie gazed upon them a moment, then opening her red lips and thereby uncovering four pearls—they are teeth in an older woman—said, "I ought to have said that I wished paper money. Oh, I am so unbusinesslike! You must be disgusted."

"Deliver my sex from businesslike women," said the cashier with a cordial smile, "and you can just as well have what you want as not, for we have all sorts and conditions of money here," saying which he handed her five ten-dollar bills.

Every one in the bank remarked simultaneously, as she closed the door, "A bewitching girl."

Two conversations were going on at the same time—and possibly another one somewhere in the world. One was in a down-town office. "He knows what he is about," said the old book-keeper.

"Almost everybody does know what he is about after a year down stairs under Pettison, and Ned has had that discipline," said the operator; "but I agree with you that he is a bang-up smart boy."

"Well, holding a man or woman wholly responsible for every act is the only way to have them come out with a spinal column," said the book-keeper. "If we could exemplify the divisibility of matter by eternally dividing Pettison and distributing him in every home, perhaps the market would not be so flooded with mollusks as it is at present, especially that half called the softer sex. How can a mollusk be hard?"

The other conversation was on a street car.

"Oh," exclaimed a sweet voice, which came from between two red lips, located below two soft brown eyes. Then she crossed the car. "Oh, Mr. Clarkson, won't you have the conductor stop the car? I ought to have got off at Ninth street"

Mr. Clarkson looked up with a delighted glance, and sprang to the rear of the car which had just started on, after a stop at Ninth street. It stopped again, and Mr. Clarkson got off to walk back with the lady to Ninth street.

"How troublesome women are!" she exclaimed; but I am so accustomed to Ned's care that I am not a bit self-reliant."

"It is the 'troublesome' women that are agreeable," he returned, with a happy laugh. "May I ever be preserved from the 'self-reliant' woman."

Mr. Clarkson had become "James." It was moonlight, and she was "driving." A bicycle shot past them; the horse jumped, the lines fell out of the carriage, and before "James" could spring to the horse's head, the vehicle had two wheels resting upon air; but he got them on terra firma before the complete overthrow of the carriage. When he was seated once more beside her, she said:

"I am just an irresponsible, and useless for an emergency."

He looked down on her with shining eyes, and said, "Oh, sweet 'irresponsible!' Don't you know that is why men were made—for emergencies?"

And she believed him.

They had been married six months and were keeping house. He had been out of town for a week. He went down cellar for a hod of coal. He returned with the hod. "Why, Nellie, there isn't a pint of coal down there," he said with a blank face.

"Oh, yes!" exclaimed Nellie. "Kate told me day before yesterday that we needed coal, but I forgot all about it," and two lips as red as ever uncovered four pearls as pearly as ever, below two soft brown eyes as soft brown as ever, as she leaned complacently back in her chair, with her arms over her head to drink in the words, "Well, sweetheart, we'll just have to draw so much heavier on our hearts' warmth till I can order some."

She watched his mouth. His lips parted. He said: "This fire won't last till midnight, and it will be beastly having to dress in the cold."

The fire went out then, for Nellie.

They had been married three years, and the house had for one year contained two jewels, brighter than diamonds and more dear, duplicates of herself and Ned—twins. Her cheeks were neither round nor red now, for those two fat, heavy, red-cheeked babies had had every disease that children can thrive on, and not one night's unbroken rest had she had since their arrival. She did not dress so well either, for they were saving to buy a home of their own; a house with a yard, where the "jewels" could roll on the grass and "play house" under a tree.

She went down town to get a check cashed, for Christmas was near. The same kind cashier of a time some years before was bringing her the money, when she said with her old-time sweetness: "I forgot to ask you to bring it all in paper except one five-dollar gold piece."

With a weary air he turned to comply with her request. He turned toward her again. "I beg your pardon, but I wanted two five-dollar gold pieces. I am so sorry to make you so much trouble, but I want them for Christmas gifts."

He stood still and looked coldly at her; then he folded his arms across his chest and said: "Are you quite sure that is the final decision?"

And all her answer was in the color which rose, and in her eyes, which dropped.

The president of the bank had stood near, and, when Nellie left he volunteered: "That fine young man who just deposited $10,000 for Cross & Co. is her brother. They are twins, and when they were children I used to visit the father in his home. Then, she was fully her brother's equal, if not more; but there seems to come a time—and an early one—when a boy shoots ahead, while the girl stands still, if she does not deteriorate. The law of sex will show itself."

"James" was coming home to his midday meal. About two blocks from home he came upon No. 46 and a crowd surrounding a smashed carriage and a broken-legged horse, which he recognized as his own. No. 46 was saying, "The woman went into the house and left him unhitched. I could see that he was a horse that wouldn't stand without tying, and before I could reach him he turned around, got frightened at his own footsteps, and began to run. For total absence of judgment in all matters of common-sense, just give me a woman. Ain't that so?" he concluded, turning to James.

"I wish I could dispute it," James said bitterly. Then, with a start, he saw a few steps away, a woman lying on some coats. It was Nellie, with her leg broken, and she had heard every word.

Next day, as she lay where she would lie for many a long week, James said: "How could you have left Jim when you know he won't stand a moment?"

"I just came in to bring Mary the sugar, and was going back down-town for some other necessaries. When I saw him turn I ran out to stop him, but No. 46 made him shy towards me, and he knocked me down, and the carriage wheels ran over my right leg. Besides," she continued, "I didn't feel that much damage could be done if he did start to run, with policemen everywhere."

"Policemen 'everywhere!'" replied James scornfully. "Most people hold quite opposite views on that subject. Well," concluded James, in the tone of the schoolmaster who says, "Now stand up and take your punishment," "well, this postpones the house for another year."

Her bed had been put in the back parlor, and that evening she interrupted James as he sat reading the newspaper by saying: "James, what would you think if a man should plant onions and weed them and water them, and say over and over and over again that he liked them above all vegetables, and then, when they were grown, be angry because they were not cabbages?"

He looked at her a little anxiously, and then said, "I wouldn't talk if I were you." Then to himself, "She's getting flighty."

"Oh, I know what you think," she smiled, but I am perfectly clear headed, as I shall prove by giving you a conundrum. You know you like riddles."

"I confess I have a weakness for them," he said, his face brightening.

"And you are so good at solving them," she went on.

"The boys seem to think so," he returned in a pleased tone.

"Well, listen," said Nellie. "Why is irresponsibility called cunning in childhood; in girlhood, bewitching; in maidenhood, charming, and in wifehood, imbecility?"

He gazed at her as though the condition suggested by the last word had taken hold upon his brain. Then he looked far into the coal stove.

"Well," said Nellie at last, "this is my solution—it is imbecility all the way up."

James went down cellar for a hod of coal.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Mrs. J. D., Va.—I hope your dear father may continue to improve and be restored entirely. I enjoy reading his letters over so much; your articles also, and I always enjoy reading Mr. E. C. Walker's. I think he is a splendid writer. Enclosed you will find fifty cents on subscription.

M. H. C., Colo.—Yours of the 20th at hand and also the books. Enclosed find $2 for two copies of "Hilda's Home." "Karezza" is a trump. It comes to self and Julia pretty late in life, but splendid for our four children—two married and one soon to be, likely.

I. L., Mo.—I suppose you have not forgotten me. We met at Ottawa. I am sure I shall never forget you and little Virna. Nor will I ever be able to give up the fight for liberty; but sometimes I feel with Giotto and L. D. W. that it is a hard and lonely "road to trabble," and I feel like giving it up and being like other folks—but that is hardest of all. So I am with you for good and all. Hope your father is better. I know he wants to be home and at work again, but he and I must learn to be quiet. I can't go to work again for six months, so the doctor says, but at the end of that time I want to get in some reform office..... I feel very much encouraged at the outlook for reform. "Lots and lots" of people are thinking—that we find in this little out-of-the-way place. With best wishes and love to yourself and Virna, I am yours for freedom.

Mrs. A. M., Santa Ana, Cal.—I will address you as friend, for friend you have been to me through your valuable works in Lucifer. Through Dr G. I received the first copy of Lucifer, and it being so different from anything I had ever read, so much more sensible and natural, that it set me to thinking very deeply on the subject of sex reform. You have a grand work before you, and the minds of a great many people are just in the right condition to receive the benefits of a thorough reform paper like Lucifer. I have two children, boy and girl, aged three and five years, and I want to bring them up alike, and if it is possible, teach my boy that he has no special privileges because he is a boy. I often think how little I was fitted for motherhood, but the best I can do now is to learn. As the old saying is, "It's never too late to mend." I admire your plan for unfortunate girls, and wish I were in circumstances where I could take a dozen for my heart goes out to them all. Please send me "What the Young Need to Know," and apply the rest of inclosure on my subscription.

D. J., Cleveland, O.—Mr. Walter Hurt, editor of the "Gatling Gun," handed me, a day or two ago, a copy of Lucifer. A careful perusal of the same has awakened an interest in me, sufficient at least to make further investigation. I have always believed that a state of society in which man and woman can contract and bind themselves together by law but cannot by mutual agreement do the opposite, viz., separate, is wrong. I have therefore been an earnest advocate of "divorce by mutual consent," but I find that this remedy is impracticable, and in fact is not sufficiently far reaching in its effects towards curing the evil. I am therefore, as you see, in the position of one who has recoguized an evil but has failed to find the cure. I have selected a book, which from its title, I inferred would throw light on your theories. I would, in addition, be very much pleased to hear an expression of your ideas if you find it convenient to write. You may send me Lucifer for six months, also "Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs," by Oswald Dawson. You will find enclosed herein money order in payment of same, and for post age on book.

Mrs. B. M., Okla.—I have been thinking for some time I would write you for information on various subjects, but have been putting it off for want of time, until something came to my notice which compels me to write. There is a young woman here who has dared to think and act for herself and is snubbed on all sides. She is an orphan and has just come into the neighborhood. Can you tell me where she could be sent? I am radical enough to dare the opinion of the people, but I have a public office and that would debar me. We like Lucifer, and I am letting every one read it that I dare to, and it is doing good work. The people here are very ignorant, not many of the older people can write their own names nor read them when written. Can you tell where liberals live in Texas? There are freethinkers around here who want to know, for they say they just can't live in the church element. If you would or could print in your paper some names of the most prominent ones and their locality it would be a great favor. Some whom I know are splendid speakers and workers in the labor movement. Some have stayed at our house and we put your paper in their hands, and every once in awhile one says, "Well, I am a better man than when I came here." They did not know that any one dared print such books and papers.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

At last we have a cheap and good American edition of this incomparable creation of the Astronomer-Poet of Persia, as rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Once read, "The Rubaiyat" is read again and again and each time with new insight and delight.

It is the wish of Swinburne that the rich gift of Omar Khayyam of Naish apur may "be tasted in that most exquisite English translation, sovereignly faultless in form and color of verse, which gives to those ignorant of the East a relish of the treasure and a delight in the beauty of its wisdom." With sketch of Omar's life. Symbolical cover. Price 10 cents. Address M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

The following by WILLIAM DENTON, pioneer Freethought and Spiritualist lecturer, and naturalist, who died while on a journey of scientific research in the wilds of Australia some fifteen years ago, are of as vital importance now as when they were written:

Sermons from Shakespeare's Text:
"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything."

Orthodoxy False, Since Spiritualism is True.
The God Proposed for Our National Constitution.
What is Right?
Man's True Saviors.
Christianity No Finality or Spiritualism Superior to Christianity.
Who are Christians?

Sent to any address for 10 cents each, by M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

"A WOMAN, in order to live the purest life, must be free; must enjoy the full privilege of soliciting the love of any man, or of none, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD", by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 450 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy and others. Price $1. For sale at this office.

A PHYSICIAN IN THE HOUSE.

A New Family Medical Work, by Dr. J. H. Greer.

This book is up-to-date in every particular.
It will save you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills.
It tells you how to cure yourself by simple and harmless home remedies.
It recommends no poisonous or dangerous drugs.
It teaches how to save health and life by safe methods.
It teaches prevention—that it is better to know how to live and avoid disease than to take any medicine as a cure.
It is not an advertisement and has no medicine to sell.
It has hundreds of excellent recipes for the cure of the various diseases.
It has 16 colored plates, showing different parts of the human body.
The chapter on Painless Midwifery is worth its weight in gold to women.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. Svo. 172 pages. Price 25 cents.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 20 cents per dozen.

KAREZZA Ethics of Marriage.
A bold, brave book teaching ideal marriage, rights of the unborn child, a designed and controlled maternity.
"Union Signal": Thousands of women have blessed Dr. Stockham for Tokology, thousands of men and women will bless her for Karezza.
"Arena": Karezza is worth its weight in gold.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 356 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Ideala was a woman too thoughtful, too honest, too true for the conventional "middle class" English society in which she lived. Her life story furnishes much food for thought for those who like to study the facts of life when disguised as fiction. 195 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth, with silver lettering. Price, postpaid, 35 cents.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 18. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MAY 13, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 761

The Lion Path.

I dare not!——

Look—the road is very dark—
The trees stir soft and the bushes shake—
The long grass rustles, and the darkness moves
Here—there—beyond ——
There's something crept across the road just now!
And you would have me go?
Go there—through that live darkness hideous
With stir of crouching forms that wait to kill?
Ah look! See there—and there—and there again—
Great yellow glassy eyes, close to the ground!
Look! Now the clouds are lighter I can see
The long slow lashing of the sinewy tails
And the set quiver of strong jaws that wait—!
Go there? Not I! Who dares to go who sees
So perfectly the lions in the path?

Comes one who dares.

Afraid at first, yet bound
On such high errand as no fear could stay.
Forth goes he with the lions in his path.
And then? ——

He dared a death of agony—
Outnumbered battle with the king of beasts—
Long struggle in the horror of the night—
Dared, and went forth to meet—O ye who fear!
Finding an empty road, and nothing there.
A wide bare common road, with homely fields
And fences, and the dusty roadside trees.
—Some spitting kittens, maybe, in the grass.

Jealousy as a Cause of Crime.

BY MARY HRUNDAGH.

Who has not been horrified beyond description by the account of the terrible tragedies which we read in papers daily. Divorces, prostitution, suicide and murder! Police Chapman, Theologian Parkhurst, Moralist Grannis, detectives and newspapers, all busy trying to find a remedy for the social evils that beset us.

Neither divorce, nor the consecrated marriage permitting no divorce reduces inharmony in family life in general. Arrest and punishment of solicitors on the street does not stop prostitution. Clearing the "Bowery" only transfers the evils to another location. Laws against attempted suicide furnishe no incentive to live when real desire for death comes, and electrocution has not terrors enough to stay the hand of the murderer. No one seems to expect to cure the evil.

Mrs. Grannis thinks not one man in ten outside the church is virtuous. She does not tell the people the proportion in the churches. Grant thinks even Christianity helps only the few, and proposes to keep the evil stream within a certain channel by the wall of segregation. Detectives hunt up culprits and law shuts them up and no one seems able to assign a cause for such evils. What is the reason for persons acting so badly?

When I read of the Guldensuppe murder I asked,

"How could they cut a man up so, even if in a passion they killed him?"

A friend replied:

"Jealousy could do it; ninety per cent of all murders are caused by jealousy."

I believe that is the cause of all the troubles mentioned. Humanity has come to look upon love as a commodity, one and indivisible. The person who loves is held to be able to limit that love, or if not, he or she is very immoral. Hence at the first intimation that any love is expressed for another there is the terrible fear of loss, and the suffering of envy an uncultured person feels when he sees a superior do something he would like to do and cannot do. I am well aware that society does not want to look at the question in this way—it wants to see it in the accustomed way, the old-fashioned way.

For generations laws and customs have tried to enforce the ideas of conventional morality now upheld; they have never succeeded. Love will risk being murdered rather than go unexpressed, and the owner of another's love will risk electrocution rather than yield its property rights.

There is one solution to this trouble, and that is education. Love is appreciative of those attributes and things in life that make us most happy. We appreciate one person's music without expecting to be blamed if another musician touches chords that thrill us as well. We admire the oratory of a Phillips without censure because we also love the speech of a Beecher. We cannot choose whether a white, a red, or a yellow rose is sweetest. In everything in life except love of individuals, we think a person more cultivated who understands and loves many things than one who knows but one thing. A real true appreciation of this fact will make any one of us understand that love for another does not weaken love for one. A woman or a man must be a great egotist who thinks himself or herself capable of supplying another person's wants to the extent that no one else is loved. When I look around me and see women who are my superiors, some in beauty, some in one accomplishment, some in another, some in education, etc., I feel that I could not love a man who had so little appreciation of these qualities that he did not see and love them, or who was hypocritical enough to deny it. When a man I love tells me of his love for others, and what he loves in them, I can believe him when he says he loves me. The man who loves me best and whom I love best, is the one whose nature I harmonize with in most ways. But because I love him in many ways is that any reason why I should withhold my love in some one way, from the person who has one superior claim, or that I should be jealous because my lover finds a counterpart in some other person in something I have not? Not at all. I certainly should not prohibit him from something because I cannot supply it. Then if he loves me for my gentleness, affection and intellect, how can he help loving the same things in others. There is no ground for jealousy in natural appreciation. It is in our notions, our habit of ownership of the property and person of the one we love.

We talk a gospel of love, but enact and enforce a policy of hatred. It is legal and moral to express hatred for your neighbors, but illegal and immoral to express love, especially if you are really sincere in it. An understanding of the question is the only thing that will do away with jealousy and its consequent crimes.

When we are not forced by society to lie about love, when we can acknowledge we love as many as we do love without being considered wicked, the deceit, the treachery, will have no place, and then all can love and be loved. No woman will need to solicit a man on the street, no man will be so depraved as to have no choice and accept such a woman; prostitution will die a natural death. The time spent by intriguing wives and husbands to prevent an expression of love can be put to self-improvement and make them worthy of love. No one will murder another for jealousy, and Parkhurst, Chapman and Grannis can enjoy their own lives instead of trying to regulate the lives of others.

This is no visionary theory; it is in practice and eminently successful with many persons, now.

A Preacher Advocates the Abolition of Marriage and Divorce Laws.

[I inclose clipping from a Denver daily (I don't know which one). If you haven't seen the sermon or the interview it may do you good, as it does me, to read the sentiments. Recently I heard Dr. Myers at the Broadway Theatre in Denver and at once decided that was my church. As a seeker of truth it does the innermost me good to listen to a teacher who so nearly approximates it. VER H. VINCENT.]

"If I had a daughter who wished a husband I would take her to a phrenologist who would select a man. I would take my daughter to that man and marry them—but they should live together whether married or not."

These words were attributed by a local paper to Rev. Dr. Myers in a recent address at the Broadway temple. Mr. Myers denied yesterday that he had been correctly reported.

"I have been misunderstood," he said. "I didn't say that I would go to a phrenologist to pick out a husband for my daughter, nor did I leave that impresson of compelling her to marry the man picked out. What I did say was this: 'If I had a daughter who wanted to get married I would take her and her intended husband to a phrenologist, and if he said they were congenial and compatible, I would say, "get married," and if they wanted to live together unmarried by human law, I would say, "live together," for they would, if they were properly matched, be married by a law of heaven more powerful and more binding than if a priest had joined them.'

"If I could regulate the laws," he continued, "I would do away with marriage and divorce laws. Here we sit on God's footstool and make long lists of laws when we ought to throw them away and learn the first sweet noble laws of nature. The human race will never be happy until nature rules the world as it should. Marriage and divorce laws are substitutes for imbecility. They are childish, foolish, absurd. The idea of saying to nature, 'that man and that woman are man and wife,' when nature knows that they are not. Natural laws are complete and perfect. No flower that blows is without its mate, nor any bird that flies. Every man has his affinity and every woman hers; and if a man is married by law to a woman who is not his affinity it is wrong for them to live together. They are not man and wife. A crystal will unite with another crystal and the effect is beautiful, but a crystal will not unite with either granite or sandstone.

"Nature gives every man a wife," said Mr. Myers. "Marriage is fitly represented by a window. All the flies on the outside want to come in and all on the inside want to get out. For heaven's sake let them out, for if they're in and want to get out they shouldn't be in."

Dr. Myers warmed up to his subject again and gestured excitedly.

"Why should they go through a lot of law before they can get out? I'd take all the little laws for divorce in all the states and put them together into one general law so that every couple married when they ought not to be married could be divorced easily. It's too bad we have to have the law at all. Shame on Moses, who originated it!

"Now here are three chemicals," he went on, reaching down for a paper and pointing out imaginary objects; "here is one and here are the others. Now, I can put this with this and there would be a frightful quarrel; they must be taken away from each other as soon as possible. These two, however, formed perfect equilibrium and must remain together."

"But do you think a phrenologist would be able to discover an affinity?" he was asked.

"I most assuredly do," he answered. "Why, I myself could tell."

"Suppose a woman discovers her affinity and he has already married?"

"Then she should marry him any way, and if a divorce from the man's wife were unattainable she should live with him anyway. It would be a sin if she did not, an injustice to herself and to him and to that woman who had been untairly called his wife. She was not his wife in truth and before heaven if she was not his affinity. God is love and this love pervades everything—the world is nothing without it, and perfect love is found in the mating of a man with his affinity. The large class of criminals and fools are the result of these uncongenial marriages. Most of the insanity and vice in the world is caused by them. What an ideal world it would be if we could be married by God in heaven, each man with the woman whom nature has picked out for him."

Sincerity vs. Secrecy

From "Psychology of Sex." by Havelock Ellis.

As a youth, I had hoped to settle problems for those who came after; now I am quietly content if I do little more than state them. For even that, I now think, is much; it is at least the half of knowledge. In this particular field the evil of ignorance is magnified by our efforts to suppress that which never can be suppressed, though in the effort of suppression it may become perverted. I have at least tried to find out what are the facts among normal people as well as among abnormal people; for, while it seems to me that the physician's training is necessary in order to ascertain the facts, the physician for the most part only obtains the abnormal facts, which alone bring little light. I have tried to get at the facts, and, having got at the facts, to look them simply and squarely in the face. If I cannot perhaps turn the lock myself, I bring the key which alone in the end rightly opens the door: the key of sincerity. That is my one panacea: sincerity.

I know that many of my friends, people on whose side I, too am to be found, retort with another word: reticence. It is a mistake, they say, to try to uncover these things; let the sexual instincts alone to grow up and develop in the shy solitude they love, and they will be sure to grow up and develop wholesomely. But, as a matter of fact, that is precisely what we cannot and will not ever allow them to do. There are very few middle-aged men who can clearly recall the facts of their lives and tell in all honesty that their sexual instincts have developed easily and wholesomely throughout. And it should not be difficult to see why this is so. Let my friends try to transfer their feelings and theories from the productive region to, let us say, the nutritive region, the only other which can be compared to it for importance. Suppose that eating and drinking were never spoken of openly, save in veiled or poetic language, and that no one ever ate food publicly, because it was considered immoral and immodest to reveal the mysteries of this natural function. We know what would occur. A considerable proportion of the community, more especially the more youthful members possessed by an instinctive and legitimate curiosity, would concentrate their thoughts on the subject. They would have so many problems to puzzle over: How often ought I to eat? What ought I to eat? Is it wrong to eat fruit which I like? Instinct notwithstanding, we may be quite sure that only a small minority would succeed in eating reasonably and wholesomely. The sexual secrecy of life is even more disastrous than such a nutritive secrecy would be; partly because we expend such a wealth of moral energy in directing or misdirecting it, partly because the sexual impulse normally develops at the same time as the intellectual, not in the early years of life, when wholesome instinctive habits might be formed. And there is always some ignorant and foolish friend who is prepared to still further muddle things: Eat a meal every other day! Eat twelve meals a day! Never eat fruit! Always eat grass! The advice in sexual matters is usually not less absurd than this. When, however, the matter is fully open, the problems of food are not, indeed, wholly solved, but everyone is enabled by the experience of his fellows to reach some sort of solution suited to his own case. And when the rigid secrecy is once swept away a sane and natural reticence becomes for the first time possible.

The Policy of Exclusion.

George E. Macdonald in "Truth Seeker."

In expressing her surprise at my recent observations (April 15) about Mr. W. E. Johnson, who wants an expurgated edition of the American Secular Union, Mrs. Helen M. Lucas says:

"I don't understand him [Mr. Johnson] as having any intention of bringing the present Freethinkers' Association into disrepute."

I don't either. He is well-meaning, but uninstructed. My previous remark about Mr. Johnson was this:

"He doesn't even 'savvy' that the big talk lately made about 'a national Freethinkers' association for the twentieth century' was not started with the organization of any such association in view, but with the subtle intent to bring the present one into disrepute."

Mr. Johnson was not the starter of the talk. He was only one among those who were beguiled by it, and he is not charged with subtlety. I think it will be safe for Mrs. Lucas to accept as true my statement as to the intent of the original proposer of the new organization, i. e., to augment any dissatisfaction that may be felt with the American Secular Union.

The respected lady asks:

"Are anarchy, etc., so very popular that we should hang on to them or take them into our wagon?"

As members of the American Secular Union we are not expected to consider the anarchist or his ways. The Union furnishes us with no viewpoint whence we may regard him. If we insist on contemplating the anarchist we must do so as individuals and on our own responsibility. The association cannot back us up in such a proceeding, for it is non-committal. I do not believe that the Union should officially recognize the "anarchist, etc." but without doing so it cannot exclude them, and exclusion would be no less irrelevant than inviting them into our midst. Mr. Johnson and those who sustain him should be able to see that in raising the anarchist question they, and not the radicals, are exalting a divisive issue.

His Marriage a Success—But Hers ——?

"Beiyel Advocate."

Some one wanted to know the opinion of a Cumberland County farmer on the question, Is marriage a failure? His reply was: "I should say not. Why, Lucindy gets up in the morning, milks the cows, and gets breakfast, starts four children to school, looks after three others, feeds the calves and pigs, skims the milk, washes the clothes, gets the dinner and does lots of other work, and helps in the field when she is not busy. Think I could hire anybody else for what she gets? Marriage is a grand success."

[And this is no joke, though the Chicago "Tribune" reprinted it as one.]

Our Motto in the Philippines: "Lead is Cheaper Than Rice."

An illustration of the way in which the United States "protects" the weak is given in the letter of a soldier, Timothy Lynch, serving in the Philippines, which was published in the San Francisco "Call" of March 18. Since it has become "treason" to send through the mails speeches delivered in Congress and printed officially, it would probably be dangerous to comment on the occurrences detailed in this letter. But perhaps comment would be unnecessary. Let our gallant defender of liberty speak for himself, and let our proud bird scream in triumph as his talons tear the quivering flesh of the naked savages who dare rise in rebellion against their owners!

THE SOLDIER SPEAKS:

"When we stopped shelling Santa Ana, the First California regiment entered, and what we had not burned they finished with a vengeance. Their motto, as well as that of the other regiments is: 'The only good Filipino is a dead one; take no prisoners, as lead is cheaper than rice.'

"The Tennessee men were on the right and an orderly came aboard and reported that they were killing every native in sight, whether a soldier or not. The boys were enjoying themselves shooting 'niggers on the run.'

"All along the river we could see the corpses of the natives lying on the banks or floating down the river. The Idahoes at one place were burying the natives, and at the hole I saw them throw in sixty-five bodies.

"Our own batteries and regiment did not do much Saturday night, but the next morning they made one of the grandest charges in history. They charged a cemetery that was full of natives, and piled them up till you could not count the dead. They say our major bears a charmed life. He rode at the head of the column, urging his men forward and telling them to spare not even the wounded, thrusting his own sword through every wounded insurgent he passed."

"Cuba's Fight for Freedom and the War With Spain."

However much the readers of Lucifer may differ in regard to the rightness of the unrighteousness of the part taken by the American government in the war of "Intervention" in Cuba's behalf, we are all interested in the past history and the future prospects of the "Queen of the Antilles," as this famous island has often been called. A friend has donated for Lucifer's benefit a few copies of a large and handsomely bound volume with the above title. The book claims to be: "A comprehensive, accurate and thrilling history of the Spanish Kingdom and its latest and fairest colony; the long struggle of Cuba for freedom and independence; the Intervention of the United States and the Fierce War with Spain that Followed; A Record of Oppression and Patriotism, of Cruelty and Valor, and above all of the Triumph of the Stars and Stripes. Profusely illustrated. Written and edited by Henry Houghton Beck, author of 'Famous Battles,' the 'Greco-Turkish War,' etc., etc. Published by the Globe Publishing Co., Philadelphia."

The book contains 569 pages, heavy paper, excellent print; price in half Morocco with marbled edges, $2; same in cloth, $1.50. On receipt of price and 17 cents for postage, we will send by post or express one copy of this handsomely bound and profusely illustrated volume—including a twenty-inch map of Cuba and Porto Rico, and Lucifer one year. As our supply of this book is quite limited, those who wish to avail themselves of this liberal offer will do well to send in their orders soon.

Edward Atkinson is a long way from being an anarchist, yet anarchists agree with him when he says, as quoted in a dispatch from Boston, April 27, that he favors "the kind of subordination which I hope, with Tolstoi, will ere long pervade all armies to the end that criminal aggression may be made impossible by the refusal of soldiers who think for themselves to carry out orders which are as abhorrent to them as they are inconsistent with any moral, economic or political principle."

Mississippi Notes.

THAYER, MISS., May 7, '99.

Omitting for the present my notes in regard to New Orleans and other points in Louisiana, I want to say a few words concerning the locality in which I am now sojourning.

Having good reasons for knowing that some hundreds if not thousands of Lucifer's readers are now anxious to get reliable information concerning lands in the southern part of the United States, I have constantly kept that fact in mind since leaving Chicago in January last. Hitherto I have refrained from expressing any decided opinion in regard to the comparative advantages for settlement offered by the various localities visited by me, thinking it best to wait until more extended observation would better qualify me to speak understandingly.

In considering advantages and disadvantages of location the average home seeker, if I mistake not, will have in view mainly the following considerations:

First, Healthfulness of situation. The factors promotive of healthfulness are chiefly the following: Purity of air; purity and plentifulness of water; temperature—climatic influences—neither too hot nor too cold; freedom from great and sudden changes, etc.

Second, Fertility and price of land.

Third, Nearness to market, or to railway and water transportation.

Fourth, Prospects for good social conditions or environments.

While it is doubtless true that no single locality possesses all these advantages in perfection, I now say to all who care for my opinion, that I think the hill country of Southern Mississippi, on the line of the Illinois Central Railway, offers more of these advantages than does any other part of the South that has yet been visited by me. Take, for example, the lands in the southern part of Lincoln county, in or near the new town called Thayer, near to which town I have spent about three weeks of my vacation. The lands here are mostly high and rolling—said to be about "five hundred feet above high water mark." In healthfulness this section is said to be unsurpassed anywhere in the United States. The state of Mississippi, as a whole, ranks as one of the most healthful, as shown by the United States census. This county has never had a case of yellow fever, so I am told. The water here is of the purest—equalling, it is claimed, distilled water in healthfulness.

The hill country is covered with a heavy growth of timber—pine, oak, hickory, gum, dogwood and other hardwood trees. On the bottom lands are also found magnolia, live oak, beech, maple and other kinds of timber, many of which are not seen in the latitude of Illinois. The largest pines have been mainly removed by lumbermen, but there are still vast quantities of very superior timber here, both of pine and of the hardwood already mentioned.

The soils on the uplands are mainly composed of yellowish or reddish clay, with an admixture of sand and vegetable loam. Good crops of cotton, corn, potatoes—both white and sweet—beans, peas, tomatoes, cabbages, etc., etc., are grown, many of these producing two crops per annum. Brookhaven, the county seat of this county, ships thousands of bales of cotton every year.

But next to health, it is as a fruit-growing and nut-growing country that I feel mainly interested in this part of the Sunny South. At present the strawberry is the chief fruit raised here for market. The "Mississippi Hand Book," issued by the Experiment Station, Agricultural College, states that "more strawberries are grown between Hazlehurst and Durant, on the Illinois Central railroad, than on any other equal area in the world." The same authority says there are no diseases or insect enemies to contend with in strawberry culture. "With proper care and culture a yield of one hundred bushels per acre is not uncommon. Our first shipments are commonly made in March, and the fruit continues to ripen in quantity until June, while occasional pickings may often be found much later. In the central and southern part of the state a few ripe berries may be found at almost any time, and Dr. McKay, of Madison station, the largest grower in the state, informs us that he has shipped strawberries to the Chicago market during every month in the year."

The same "Hand Book" maintains that apples, pears, peaches, plums, grapes and other fruits common to the temperate zone, all do well here, and such is the testimony of the people with whom I have talked on the subject. Grapes never fail to bear full crops, and peaches very rarely fail. D. T. Price, of Booneville, Miss., says he has had "eight full crops of peaches in ten years," and this seems to be about the average as given by other growers. This year there will be very few peaches in Mississippi owing to the unprecedented cold snap in February.

Not wishing to monopolize Lucifer's space, I will reserve to another issue a further description of the inducements held out to landless home-seekers by this part of Mississippi, U. S. A.

M. HARMAN.

Mrs. Partington's Latest Imitator.

The "English High Church party" has equipped itself with broom and mop and is heroically striving to push back the advancing tide of marital reform. Its efforts will probably be as successful as were those of the illustrious Mrs. Partington, when she tried to resist the swell of the Atlantic Ocean.

Under date of May 1, the cable dispatches from London inform us that "On Saturday afternoon a military officer who had divorced his wife eighteen months since, was remarried in Christ Church. The marriage was being conducted quite privately, no one being present but the immediate relatives of both parties.

"Everything proceeded in orderly fashion until the words of the service calling upon 'any man to allege and declare any impediment why they may not be coupled together in matrimony by God's law, or the laws of this realm' were reached.

"Here the Rev. Dr. Edwin Walker, who was standing unnoticed in a pew apart from the small company of guests, answered in a loud voice:

"'I, Edwin Walker, assistant priest of St. Peter's, London Docks, do allege and declare an impediment why these persons may not be coupled together in matrimony by God's law. This man has a canonical wife living.'

"The wedding party first stood aghast at the interruption, but two church wardens then advanced and forcibly removed Walker from the church. On the way a military friend of the bridegroom struck him a blow on the side of the head, to the great scandal of all present. The bride had been supported by her father, and it was several minutes before the ceremony could be proceeded with.

"The Rev. Edwin Walker, interviewed, said:

"'It makes no difference to those for whom I speak that the bridegroom was an innocent party in a divorce suit. He cannot be married according to canon law, while the canonical wife is living. I came here at the instance of Father Black, who has repeatedly made these protests, as we desire to show other clergymen are at one with him in this matter. There are plenty of registry offices where these divorced people can enter into a civil contract, and they should not desecrate the house of God by being married in church. We will render it impossible for any divorced persons to be remarried in London without such scandal as has occurred in this instance.'"

The reverend gentleman has my most earnest wishes for his success in his self-appointed task. I hope he will make so many "scandals" that the solemnity, mysticism and grandeur which have made church weddings so attractive to the people, will be lost in the ridiculous situations brought about by the ecclesiastics. The day has gone by when people who desired to marry would refrain from marriage merely because a preacher or priest refused to perform the ceremony. The preacher who so refuses sustains the loss of his nose, to make use of the homely saying, without attaining even the melancholy satisfaction of spiting his face.

Will Economic Freedom Alone, Free Women?

The following extract from a letter by a prominent socialist author will, I think, interest Lucifer's readers. The letter was not written for publication, so I withhold the name:

"I often find time to read your paper, which you must carry on at a great sacrifice. Still I think the slavery of women lies deeper than in the social conscience. I think that economic equality will free them and abolish marriage. I personally know many women whose position is one of continual torment, obliged to worse than waste their lives because they can do nothing—nor go anywhere. Most advanced socialists are free lovers, but abstain from announcing their convictions on account of the influence it would have on the socialist movement.

"How useless it would be for us to attempt to further your movement in our ranks is shown in last week's 'Coming Nation,' where a bid for the support of the rabble is made by charging that the 'old members' are free lovers. That is true, but they did not attempt to change Ruskin into a free love colony. It is very likely that the failure of the colony will be charged to free love sentiment, but while these people had control it prospered, and when the others got it, through an anti-free love crusade, it went down through their incompetency and mismanagement. I can give you any information you may desire on this matter in case it should assume public proportions."

To educate the "social conscience" will not alone give all women social freedom. Economic independence is needed as well. But it is at least equally true that economic independence alone will not free men and women socially. If it would, why the opposition to freedom at Ruskin, where men and women are supposed to be economically equal and independent? Is not the attitude of the Ruskinites and other Socialists proof that we need to educate the "social conscience" before people will be permitted to enjoy social freedom even under conditions of economic independence?

Our friend sees women living in degradation from which they cannot escape because of financial dependence; but does he not know many other women who are not dependent on others for their subsistence, and yet are slaves to their own unenlightened conscience, or to the consciences of their neighbors?

I do not know whether work for economic independence or for the education of the social conscience is most important. Both are vitally necessary, and I think each person should take up the work which he or she is conscious of being best fitted for, sometimes feel an inclination to "magnify mine office." I try to If I remember that the work of others is quite as important to them as mine is to me. There is room for all, there is work for all, and there should be cheer, kindly feeling, and hope for all.

A Child of Liberty.

In Lucifer, September 24, E. C. Walker wrote:

"Another western girl has had the rare courage to calmly disregard the conventions of 'society' and deliberately assume motherhood, and this in a rural district where the community is a committee of the whole to intervene, censure and supervise. Few are the women who can serenely smile in the face of the frowning Mrs. Grundy. Out of the west are coming the pioneers of serious, self-electing, self-respecting motherhood."

I am in receipt of a letter from the young mother referred to, inclosing photographs of little Fern, now eight months old, and herself. The letter was not written for publication, but I am sure it will find interested readers:

"MY DEAR FRIEND AND SISTER LILLIAN: I have long wanted to write to you. Your experiences and trials and triumphs have inspired me with admiration for your courage in the cause of sex liberty and equality, and your love and sympathy for your sister women have won my heart-felt gratitude. I have been a very interested reader of Lucifer for ten years. I have enjoyed reading your articles so much. I remember the first time I ever heard of you I fell in love with your name, and shortly thereafter a little sister was born and I wanted so much to call her Lillian that Mamma told me I could. She is now twelve years old and reads Lucifer every week.

"I have loved babies all my life and I wanted one of my own, and believing I had as much right to have one as any other woman, I got one. I love her very dearly and she is ever so much comfort to me; but sometimes I think it is wicked for any woman to bring children into this world, it is such a hard old world, life seems to be one hard struggle. Children brighten life so much, but they soon grow up, then they have troubles of all kinds too. Most of my old friends think my ideas on the marriage question are very peculiar, but they respect me in spite of their prejudices. Nearly all came to see the baby and invited me to bring the baby and visit them. . . ."

I am not personally acquainted with this young woman, but friends of mine with whom she lives speak very highly of her and little Fern. The baby appears healthy and well-developed, and wears a calm, sweet expression on her dear little round face. A letter from my friend, in whose home the babe and mother live, says:

"That our little Fern is as sweet and beautiful in spirit as she is in face, we who know her can testify."

This friend has had the baby's pictures taken, and suggests that if I say anything about her in Lucifer, I add that a copy of the picture, with autograph of the mother, may be obtained by sending twenty-five cents to this office—the money to go to the baby, of course. This is in no sense an appeal for charity, however. The baby is not suffering for material comforts, nor is it likely to do so. But doubtless many people will be interested in the little one, and will be glad to possess its likeness, and her friend thought they might gratify the desire and help the child at the same time.

There is much more that might be said, but I am not quite sure if the publication of more details would be agreeable to the young mother, even with her name suppressed.

We occasionally receive announcements of the birth of children in freedom, and are quite willing to publish the fact when desired by the parents. The public has no right to demand information, at any rate so long as the parents are able and willing to take care of their children; but babies are always interesting to those who love them, and among their lovers I hope every reader of these lines may be classed.

"What Will Become of" These Children?

"While suffering from temporary aberration of mind," we read in the Bayonne (N. J.) "Budget," "Mrs. Ella B. Shannon committed suicide at her home, 26 East 24th street. Mrs. Shannon was a widow and leaves seven children between the ages of two and thirteen.

"About two years ago her husband was burned by molten metal at the Orford copper works with fatal results. Mrs. Shannon brooded over her loss and over her struggle for an existence. She was forty-one years old.

"Suspecting her own mind was deranged, one day last week Mrs. Shannon applied to Recorder Lazarus to be committed for examination by a physician. She was kindly received, and induced to abandon her strange plan. Mrs. Shannon obtained two ounces of carbolic acid from a Jersey City druggist Wednesday. She took the deadly poison before breakfast Thursday and died a most agonizing death."

Marriage is instituted for the protection of women and children, we are told. Doubtless Mrs. Shannon believed this when she married, and felt sure that, no matter how many children she should bear, she and they would be supported because she was a legal wife. Is it surprising that when she found herself the sole support of seven helpless little ones her mind gave way under the horror of the situation? Rather, is it not cause for surprise that more women who are similarly placed do not become insane? Is it not time to "educate the social conscience" so that women will refuse to bear more children than they can see reasonable prospect of supporting if the father of the children should fail, from any cause, to aid in their support? Women must learn to depend upon themselves, and no longer lean upon the broken reed of marriage superstition. L. H.

How Texas Courts Protect Husbands' Rights.

"The court of criminal appeals today decided the habeas corpus case of J. B. Warfield, from Dallas," says the Dallas "Semi-Weekly News" of April 28. "This has become a cause celebre, not only on account of its peculiarities, but because of the legal questions involved. The case grew out of a suit against Warfield by Morris for $100,000 for partially alienating the affections of his wife. Pending the suit Morris sued out a writ enjoining Warfield from writing, talking to or making signs to Mrs. Morris, on the ground that he might wholly alienate her affections. The injunction was granted. Warfield ignored it to the extent of talking to Mrs. Morris, and he was presented to the court for contempt. His defense was that while had talked to her, his conversation was not calculated to alienate her affections from Morris, and moreover, he did not visit her, but that she boarded at the same house he did and he had the right to go to his boarding-house. But Judge Morgan fined him $100 and ordered him to jail for three days for contempt.

"The court of criminal appeals declined to interfere with the judgment of the court below, and held that an injunction such as sued out by Morris was legal, and its violation could be punished as other cases of contempt."

It is not unusual for a husband to sue a man for "alienating his wife's affections," but I believe this is the first time I have heard of a judge ordering a man to refrain from speaking to a woman. It would be laughable, were it not so serious for the victims of the judicial outrage. A Texas woman has reason to be proud of the title and position of "wife." It seems reasonable to infer, from the decision of this judge, that it is a very easy matter to express contempt for his court. Indeed, it seems strange to me that any self-respecting person in its jurisdiction is out of jail. I am reminded of the story of the judge who, meeting on the street the lawyer who had just lost his case, was denounced by him in language too fervid for quotation in Lucifer.

The judge, purple with rage, exclaimed:

"Do you know, sir, that you are guilty of contempt of court? I fine you $50, sir!"

"But," protested the lawyer, "Court is not in session; you cannot fine me for contempt of court!"

"Can't fine you for contempt, do you say? I'll have you know, sir that this Court is always an object of contempt!"

How the "Young Idea" Sometimes "Shoots."

A young girl, daughter of radical parents, was one day talking to a boy of her acquaintance, when he mentioned the name of a woman whom the girl did not know.

"Is she conservative?" asked the girl.

"No," was the prompt reply; "she's a big, fat woman!"

* * *

It was the brother of this boy, to whom the same girl was complaining at another time, about the "red tape" at her school. She objected to the rules regarding vaccination and other things, and considered them all "red tape regulations." The boy was sympathetically indignant.

"Do you know what I'd do if I went to that school? I'd just hang their old red tape up on the door knob and walk out!"

Little Charlie's mother used to tell him that he must never attempt to deceive her, for his eyes would tell her whether he told the truth or not. One summer day she looked out of the window and saw him with some "bad" boys. She called him in.

"Charlie," she said, "what were you doing? Tell me the truth, now; you know your eyes will tell me, if your lips don't."

"O, mamma, I'se so tired, an' so s'eepy; I dess I'll let my eyes tell you, then!"

"Tootsie" is four years old. Dark, curling hair frames a round, doll-like face, and her big brown eyes look earnestly and solemnly as she talks street slang in a sweet, baby lisp. She came in to see my Virna one day, and as she sat on a high stool watching me work she gave me her confidences.

"We live in the back rooms—yes, we do—and Dottie and her mamma live in front. My mamma won't let me play with Dottie; she calls Dottie's mamma 'Dirty nigger trash!'"

"Indeed!" I exclaimed; then in an "aside"—"they are polite!"

"Yes they do," she responded, "they fight all the time."

[By the way, the parents of this little one are married. They have been obliged to send away the elder sister as unmanageable. Will some one please rise and explain "What will become of the children?"] L. H.

Professor Herron believes that even if women had the right of suffrage they would be disappointed, finding the privilege one in name only, because the question of political equality is secondary to and dependent upon economic equality. Suffrage advocates do not, he said, go deep enough. It is necessary that there should be general equality, social, religious, moral and intellectual before there can be equality in an economic and therefore a political sense. The present marriage system, he said, makes women practically the property of man. No true comradeship between men and women is possible, he believes, while the two stand in relation of dependent and provider.—From Report of Lecture by Prof. Herrron of Iowa College.

The idea of laws to protect a wife from being beaten by her husband is based upon the idea that men and most women have always held that women need protection. It is on a par with the chivalry that picks up a woman's handkerchief, but denounces her right to freedom of action. The New York "Journal" voices the counterfeit sentiment that passes everywhere for the genuine, a sentiment accepted by the women themselves to their utter ruin. Only the helpless need protection—the little child, the feeble-minded, the immature, the aged and infirm of either sex. Women in full possession of their faculties do not need protection. They need to assert themselves and give the world the benefit of their mature minds. The ballot will not do this. Woman herself must become alive to her power, and use it now for the betterment of herself and the nation.—"Coming Light."

The Puritan's conception of hell is where everybody minds his own business.—Harold Frederic.

VARIOUS VOICES.

P. V. Olsson, Little Rock, Ark.—Enclosed find twenty-five cents, for which mail me all you can of April 22 issues. I think that number has the best articles ever printed in Lucifer.

J. F. Lederer, Lambertville, Mich.—By this you will learn that I had to move again. This is the eighteenth time in thirty-three years. Who can beat it for a hay-seed tenant John Sherman pauper farmer?

H. L., Dallas, Tex.—I enclose you part of a page of recent issue of Dallas "News." In the special from Austin I have marked some matter which I thought might be of interest to you and your readers. Use it if you see where you can do good with it, but please do not use my name, as I am a man of family and do not wish to embarrass my wife and daughters, although I would not care much for my own part, for I have seen injustice and tyranny toward both men and women until I am almost a radical. I have been reading Lucifer as an exchange several years. At first I was shocked, but must confess that my views have been broadened and my sympathies enlarged by reading it. I admire your courage, and wish to compliment your editorial work. Would like to meet and talk with you and your father. I am a poor employe on the paper whose stationary I am using, and if you desire will send you clippings in line of your work as I may find them.

H. Clauson, Santa Cruz, Cal.—It is now somewhere about two and a half years since I stopped being a subscriber to Lucifer, for the reason that I wanted to devote all my spare time to study on lines of thought somewhat different from what Lucifer deals with, but I often long to see your common-sense paper again, so will you please send me a copy or two for the enclosed ten cents, or you can continue sending it for awhile, I shall soon send you a little more money if you do. I used to live at Redmond, Wash., but moved here to California a year ago, and bought a few acres of land three miles from Santa Cruz, and I have been busy ever since in trying to make a home on it. I like it quite well here, but will hardly be content, as congenial people are lacking; however, I have good neighbors as far as that is concerned. I may still join some strictly vegetarian co-operative colony somewhere if I find one that suits me.

N. C. Mathers, Wichita, Kas.—Enclosed find stamps, for which please send copies of Lucifer No. 759. I consider that an unusually good number for propaganda work. "Compulsory Ignorance" is most excellent, and I am sorry we do not get more of such articles than we do, into Lucifer's columns, more on the same line and of the same clear, forcible style, capable of being comprehended by any novice in the study of those subjects, instead of so many that are incomprehensible to anyone except the writers. I have learned by my limited efforts in distributing Lucifer among new readers that I could get more people interested in it and in the subjects discussed, and the theories advocated, if more of its contents were of such construction that an ordinary mind could grasp their meaning without reading it over two or three times, and studying their meaning out like an algebraic problem. Most people are too lazy to solve some of the riddles in Lucifer, even if they possessed the intellectual and literary ability. "Compulsory Ignorance" is a clear, concise statement of facts, and of existing conditions with their causes and prospects of future betterment.

Mattie Cuddie, Wathena, Kas.—I received "Hilda's Home." Have read it carefully, and in my simplicity would pronounce it almost perfect. O, that some such true pure love as it advocates might be realized in our day, that we could say, we have stood amid the eternal ways waiting for our own to come to us—and behold it has come. Friends and comrades all, is there any hope for us? I think there is. Let us work together for liberty, for in union there is strength. And now just a word in reference to "The Minister and the Woman"—or in answer to Rev. Sidney Holmes in Lucifer No. 754. Now the advice I would have given that woman is simply this: If nature's attraction is mutual, enjoy your love. So long as your pleasure is not at the expense of another's pain you are all right. And now count me as another Kansas woman who is ever ready to help in any way she can all unfortunate girls and women who are in trouble. Am glad to learn your father is getting better; hope he will soon be well. We think Lucifer is getting better and still better. Will renew my subscription as soon as possible as I do not want to miss one number.

Elsie Cole Wilcox, Lawrence, Wash.—Now that the Lucifer readers seem to have finished "sitting on" me for my protest against being invited as a friend, and then being denied even standing room in the house, I want to express my hearty approval of the way Lillian is conducting the paper in the absence of the editor-in-chief. And I also want it understood that the one complaint I made (and which I still regard as just) was the only fault I ever found with Lucifer. How many of those who have sneered at me can say as much? I regard Moses Harman as one of the grandest and best men the world ever knew, and if he has any faults (and who has not?) they spring from the head, not from the heart.

But Flora W. Fox, what do you mean by that suggestion that the "World" should have thought of asking the opinion of the mothers or other women regarding the laws by which they shall be governed? Does the farmer ask the opinion of his horses or cattle? Does the slave-owner ask the slave what he thinks of the laws by which he is to be governed? So long as women are the property of men, so long will men legislate for them without saying "by your leave." And just as long as women are slaves to religion so long will they be slaves to men. More of what Capt. Adams calls "Bible banging" is necessary to free women from priestcraft before they can be socially or politically free.

Louis A. DuBois, Springfield Armory, Mass.—I must say that Lucifer more than comes up to my expectations at the time I wrote you first. "The Story of May" is an exceptionally good thing, and I sincerely wish it could be read by a lot of goody-goody people who would have no more sense, to say nothing of a natural love for offspring, than to turn their own flesh and blood from the door. And yet, these are the same people who fear that a state of society without marriage would lead parents to abandon or neglect to care for their children. Such a short-sighted and inconsistent view of life is enough to make one wish to leave the society of his fellows and get in some lonesome corner to die of disgust. But beside these, there are many who hold our own views, and yet do not openly express them because they know the people who surround them are so narrow-minded they can see no more than an inch in front of their own noses. My own father, to whom I gave several copies of your paper for perusal, told me he had long held those views, but had never before seen them publicly expressed. I had an idea he was reading the paper as a matter of curiosity, but when the last one came and he got possession of it, I asked him if he was going out with me that evening, and he replied, "No, I want to stay and read Lucifer." As for myself, I am somewhat outspoken, and have no objection to the publication of my full name, although I admit I am inclined to choose the people to whom I talk personally. If there is any liberal in this vicinity I should be pleased to have him call and he will get the glad hand; or, if he has anything to say, and lives too far away, it will be found that I am ready and willing to exchange ideas with all people who have good sound sense enough to come in when it rains. If you like my style, write, all of you. If you don't—well, I have troubles of my own as it is—and so don't.

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

At last we have a cheap and good American edition of this incomparable creation of the Astronomer-Poet of Persia, as rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Once read, "The Rubaiyat" is read again and again and each time with new insight and delight.

It is the wish of Swinburne that the rich gift of Omar Khayyam of Naish apur may "be tasted in that most exquisite English translation, sovereignly faultless in form and color of verse, which gives to those ignorant of the East a relish of the treasure and a delight in the beauty of its wisdom." With sketch of Omar's life. Symbolical cover. Price 10 cents. Address M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

The following by WILLIAM DENTON, pioneer Freethought and Spiritualist lecturer, and naturalist, who died while on a journey of scientific research in the wilds of Australia some fifteen years ago, are of as vital importance now as when they were written:

Sermons from Shakespeare's Text:
"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything."
Orthodoxy False, Sicco Spiritualism is True.
The God Proposed for Our National Constitution.
What is Right?
Man's True Saviors.
Christianity No Finality or Spiritualism Superior to Christianity.
Who are Christians?

Sent to any address for 10 cents each, by M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

"A WOMAN, in order to live the purest life, must be FREE; must enjoy the full privilege of soliloving the love of any man, or of men, if she so desires. She must be free and independent, socially, industrially."—Page 265. This is only one specimen of the many radical and vitally important truths contained in "A CITYLESS AND COUNTRYLESS WORLD.", by Henry Olerich. Bound in red silk, with gold lettering on side and back; nearly 450 pages. Read it and you will see the defects of paternalism as set forth by Bellamy and others. Price $1. For sale at this office.

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 122 pages. Price 25 cents.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 20 cts per dozen.

KAREZZA Ethics of Marriage. A bold, brave book teaching ideal marriage, rights of the unborn child, a designed and controlled maternity.
"Union Signal": Thousands of women have blessed Dr. Stockham for Tokology, thousands of men and women will bless her for Karezza.
"Arena": Karezza is worth its weight in gold.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN
IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 206 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 60 cents; cloth, $1

Ideala was a woman too thoughtful, too honest, too true for the conventional "middle class" English society in which she lived. Her life story furnishes much food for thought for those who like to study the facts of life when disguised as fiction. 195 pages. Handsomely bound in cloth, with silver lettering. Price, postpaid, 35 cents.

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried health book, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Hear all sides, then decide." 23 chapters; 478 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eyewitnesses, the threats of mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.27, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" to missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

Contains matter pertaining to the Legitimation League and the Personal Rights Association of England. Also, four fine full page portraits of Ezra H. Heywood, Moses Harman, Lillian Harman and Lois Waisbrooker, together with sketches of their personalities and work. By Oswald Dawson. Neatly bound boards. Price, 20 cents. Address Moses Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 300 pages. Price 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation, and he appeals to physical force to arrest the discovery of new truths. What Rationalism is, and how many believe themselves Freethinkers who are only unbelieving or dogmatic religionists. The necessity for separate organizations and a division of labor among reformers. The Secular Union. Important facts and arguments in compact form. Price 5 cents. For sale at this office.

LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 19. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MAY 20, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 762

Reassurance.

Can you imagine nothing better, brother,
Than that which you have always had before?
Have you been so content with wife and mother"
You dare hope nothing more?

Have you forever prized her, praised her, sung her,
The happy queen of a most happy reign?
Never dishonored her, despised her, flung her
Derision and disdain?

Go ask the literature of all the ages!
Books that were written before woman read!
Pagan and Christian, Satirists and Sages
Read what the world has said!

There was no power on earth to bid you slacken
The generous hand that painted her disgrace!
There was no shame on earth too black to blacken
That much-praised woman face!

Eve and Pandora—always you begin it—
The ancients called her Sin and Shame and Death!
"There is no evil without a woman in it,"
The modern proverb saith.

She has been yours in uttermost possession—
Your slave, your mother, your well-chosen bride—
And you have owned in million-fold confession
You were not satisfied.

Peace then! Fear not the coming woman, brother!
Owning herself she giveth all the more!
She shall be better woman, wife and mother
Than man hath known before!

The Regeneration of Society *

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

This is a Christian nation. The fact is attested by a miracle. According to that interesting book called the New Testament "You cannot worship God and Mammon." What was an impossibility in the day of the evangelist from Nazareth is now an every day fact. I need not cite examples of millionaires who have given millions to establish and maintain sectarian schools; it is sufficient proof of the wedding of God and Mammon to pick up a silver dollar, or a twenty-dollar gold piece and see inscribed thereon "In God we trust." Hence my declaration that this is a Christian nation. Then by virtue of your dollar—you silverites—by virtue of your double Eagle, you gold bugs, I address you as Christians, and I say unto you "Except ye be born again ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of Heaven." That was the saying of the Nazarene, but the world seems to have lost its significance. It is true. I will qualify that statement by saying that I do not know what the kingdom of heaven is, but if it is a state of perfection, I also say "Except you be born again you shall never attain the proper and possible development of the human race." Those who heard this saying of old marveled and said, "Is it possible for a man to enter again into his mother's womb and be born again?" The answer given was mystic, but this is not a day of mysticism. I say unto you, "Ye are born again in your posterity and unless the children of the future shall be born under right conditions the race is doomed to ignominious extinction."

The state and the church have undertaken to say how children shall be brought into existence. They have declared that this matter is not one which can safely be left to the parents.

The statute-moralists, from time beyond memroy, have clamored for "Laws, laws, more laws, to regulate marriage, believing that if marriage were made hard to break into, and nearly or quite impossible to break out of, everything would be perfect. In the eyes of these regulators of the lives of others, parents are the natural enemies of their offspring.

It would seem that men and women are supposed to have a strange desire to bring into the world as many children as possible in order that they may neglect and starve and murder them or consign them to foundling asylums.

Male cats are credited with somewhat similar propensities. It is said that young kittens are their favorite diet. But the female cat takes her offspring by the napes of their necks and removes them to a place of safety.

The human mother, however, according to our wise lawmakers, is not blessed with equal maternal affection, so society (which it should not be forgotten is composed of other fathers and mothers) must make laws to protect the children from the natural hatred of their parents. The laws are supposed to have the power to transmute neglect into thoughtful care, and hatred into love.

There are as many schools of moralists as there are schools of medicine, and the doctors of morals are as nearly like their brothers of medicine as twin peas. Each has a patent nostrum for the cure of every human ill, and each has such great confidence in the worth of his remedy that he wants it protected by law, and demands that every one shall be forced to use it. No one may die except when attended by a licensed physician of a legally recognized school.

By way of illustration I will mention the fact that in Chicago in the early spring of '98, the papers gave a great deal of space to reports of a case where for several days a burial permit was refused by the Board of Health because the patient had been attended by a Christian Scientist. The very day on which the permit was refused, permits were granted to thirty-one victims of regular physicians! Needless to say, no comment was made. These thirty-one had died according to law. And as the Christian Scientist did not obey the law, he was properly punished. The Board of Health, which was composed of doctors of medicine, believed with the doctors of divinity, in the efficacy of punishment after death.

So we can neither die nor be buried unless we comply with the regulations of our doctors of medicine, and we cannot live unless we submit to the dictation of our doctors of morals. Like the charity patients in the public hospitals, we must swallow uncomplainingly, the medicine given us by the licensed experimenters.

What matter if their prescriptions are not what we need? We must suffer and die without a murmur, for we are measured by the Procrustean bed of statute regulations, and if we are too long or too short, or too thick or too thin, we must be cut off or stretched out to fit, and if we die under the operation, why should we protest? There are many more on the way whence we came to fill our places.

Progressive physicians admit that there is little virtue in drugs; that at best they are mere palliatives. Yet we must submit to the rule of the medical regulators. Evolution does its work so slowly, we cry, and like petulant children we destroy in our effort to hasten development.

We must take our injected morality as we take our state-regulated medicine. And in no other affairs of our lives are the hands of the meddlers felt so heavily as in those most intimate and tender and important relations of love and parentage.

Every nation, every religion, has its "Be it enacted," its "Thou shalt not." The state has barred the way of evolution, has rendered natural selection of the best human characteristics impossible, by holding together the mismated and preventing those who are adapted to each other from claiming their right to reproductive association. The Church has ever given the lie to the edict, "Whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." It has given lip service to the letter, but in spirit it has said, "Whom Grundy hath joined together, let no God, let no natural attraction, put asunder.

The restrictions placed in the way of marriage itself have been many, and yet the demand is for more laws, more regulations. The cure for the evils of slavery, it is claimed, is more slavery.

If desires could be prevented by a "Be it enacted," then the law regulating the age at which young people may commit matremony might have an influence for good, since it would delay the period of gratification until more mature years. But the fact that the law does not and cannot prevent some form of gratification is its condemnation. When the law forbids the only relation which society regards as honorable this prohibition has the effect of enormously increasing the evils of prostitution and kindred evils. The young man of strong passions gratifies them in a manner which he has been taught is degrading, with the result of loss of self-respect and the growth of a feeling of contempt for womankind. His experience is a mere travesty on love. What wonder is it that his experience having been degrading in his own eyes, all sex association is to him shameful and disgusting?

Many good people believe that if men and women were not permitted to marry until they had arrived at the age of twenty-five years or more, and had acquired a certain amount of property, all the evils now inseparable from marriage would immediately disappear.

Such requirements would undoubtedly vastly increase the number of illegitimate children. Under rationalism this would be no evil, but under legalism it undoubtedly would be. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." When young persons yield to their natural desires under stress of uncontrollable passion, and in a manner which they believe to be disgraceful and sinful, they thereby lower their own self-respect. The man feels contempt for the woman whom he has professed to love, and sees an ineffaceable stain upon his offspring. So, in the majority of cases, he deserts them, and the woman, believing herself to be ruined, is driven to actual ruin.

The advocates of these restrictions try by such palliatives to relieve some of the suffering which we see on every hand. They attempt to couple responsibility with slavery, unmindful of the fact that irresponsibility has ever been the fruit of legal restrictions.

Liberty and responsibility and they alone, will save humanity from degradation. The sympathies of these good people who advocate legal restrictions are with an impersonal fetich—"Society." They fear Society will have to support uncared-for children. But does it? Who is the real sufferer? Who is it who really lives for these undesired little ones? Let the woman, not Society, decide what the property, as well as any other requirement shall be. Let no man have the power to force her to incur any risks which she does not voluntarily assume. Then, and not until then, will there cease to be over-production of the unfit.

We hear much of the rights and of the responsibility of man to the woman of his choice, and to his offspring. Apparently the woman is not in this case to any great extent, except as a sort of machine which shall produce as many children as man in his responsibility, or irresponsibility, shall compel her to bear.

Man pays the taxes; therefore he, in the aggregate, represents Society. Man pays the bills of the family; therefore he is the head of the family and must control the minor members, of whom the mother is one.

(To be continued next week).

Ayesha.

BY C. L. JAMES.

Mahometanism, the third among religions in order of numbers professing it, reckons time from that day in the year of Jesus 622, on which its founder fled from his native city of Mecca to seek refuge at the rival town of Yathreb (Medina), whither almost all his disciples had already resorted. Among many very good reasons for attaching to the date such supreme importance in Mussulman annals, there is one immediately pertinent to my subject—on that day began to diverge in the dawn of prosperity what had been united through the midnight of adversity—the fortunes of Mahomet's connections through his first wife Cadijah and through her successor Ayesha, which have involved all his followers in the schism.

Mahomet is said to have been only twenty years old when he married Cadijah, who was nearly forty, very rich and twice a widow. She had as yet no children, but bore the prophet several, of whom the youngest, Fatima, alone is known to have left descendants. All this seems hardly credible, but there is no reason to doubt the match was so unequal and so advantageous that we must be surprised to find it happy. Notwithstanding the universal prevalence of polygamy, to which Mahomet afterwards proved very much inclined, Cadijah had no rivals.

She was the first to express faith in his divine mission, for which they both sacrificed fortune and reputation. Her death, shortly before the flight of Mahomet, was a great affliction to him; nevertheless he was soon afterwards betrothed to Ayesha, the young daughter of a devoted follower, who from her is called Abu Beker, "the Father of the Maiden," because she alone among the prophets' wives was a maiden when he married her.

Fatima was married at Medina to Ali, another enthusiast who had shared her father's perils to the last.

Mahomet's greatest enemy, Abu Sofian, was governor of Mecca, and the hostile party having exhausted all minor resources of persecution, with no other result than to increase and disseminate the new creed, resolved on its apostle's assassination. When the murderers reached his house and looked in, they saw him, as they thought, asleep. Having thus no occasion for haste, they wasted a little time in consultation, and when at last they entered, the sleeper rose up to show them that he was not Mahomet but Ali. Their intended victim had escaped by a back door to the house of Abu Beker, who accompanied him to Medina through many other perils. This devoted family had left all their worldly goods to the spoiler.

"For months together," says Ayesha, "we did not light a fire to dress victuals; our food was nothing but dates and water unless any one sent us meat. The people of the prophet's household never got wheat bread two successive days."

The housekeeping of Ali and Fatima was equally primitive. But in two years Medina had gone to war with Mecca, and practically accepted Mahomet as her sovereign. Of all his numerous wives and concubines Ayesha was the undisputed favorite after Cadijah. But the exception galled her.

"Was not Cadijah stricken in years?" she asked. "Hath not Allah given thee a better wife in her stead?"

"Never!" was the reply of Mahomet, "never did God give me a better! When I was poor she enriched me; when I was pronounced a liar she believed in me; when I was opposed by all the world she remained true to me."

These words, more than ambition, which soon entered into Ayesha's heart, explain the inveterate enmity she afterwards bore to Cadijah's son-in-law and descendants. She was the more unreasonable because she received signal proof of Mahomet's devotion to herself. On one of his military expeditions circumstances made it almost certain that she had an amour with a young warrior. Mahomet, according to the accounts which have reached us, demanded no explanation, nor did Ayesha offer any until compelled to by others. The scandal was raised by a sister to one of her rivals. Her own kinsmen appear to have believed it irrefutable. There was in Medina quite a party opposed to Mahomet which eagerly took it up. A satirical poet put it into verse. Mahomet was now in great distress. He sought advice of Ali, who made the sensible remark that to be overcome by so ordinary a slight was injudicious.

> "Cæsar and Pompey, Mahomet, Bellarmine,
> Have much employed the Muse of history's pen;
> Their lives and fortunes were extremely various,
> Such worthies this world ne'er shall see again;
> Yet to them all, in three things the same luck holds:
> All four were heroes, conquerors and cuck olds."

But the honest Ali, who always treated Ayesha with that reverence due to the "Mother of the Faithful," failed to understand the situation. It was not her being unchaste, but her being found out unchaste which worried both her and her husband. With logic characteristic of such women she hated Ali henceforth, not only for being Cadijah's son-in-law, but for not seeing how to whitewash herself. In truth, no one could be expected to see except Mahomet, whose resources were inexhaustible. He promulgated—of course by revelation—a law which made it practically impossible to convict any woman of adultery.* The poet and the sister of Ayesha's rival were severely punished for slander under the terms of this retrospective statute. No doubt it served them right for not minding their own business.

Henceforth, Ayesha's influence with Mahomet steadily increased. Nothing—not even his own laws, which a revelation was always ready to modify upon occasion, could prevent his sometimes running after other women, among whom the Coptic slave Mary was the favorite. But towards the end of his life Ayesha had become his most trusted and almost his only companion.

Mahomet had always been subject to epilepsy, with which the profane associate his revelations; he also complained of frequent suffering from the effects of a poison which had once been administered to him by the conquered Jews of Khaibar. Although his death had been expected for several days before it happened, Ayesha was alone with him, when, after a delusive appearance of improvement, he expired in sudden convulsions.

The great question who was to govern, now rested on the word of Ayesha. She persuaded many that Mahomet had designated her father as his successor. At the same time she won another principal candidate, Omar, by proposing that the office should be elective. This disposed of Ali's hereditary claim, which was the best, and left Omar probable successor to the aged Abu Beker. Omar and Abu Beker having united their forces, the latter was proclaimed "Commander of the Faithful," and Ali had to give way.

Abu Beker, as had been expected, was succeeded, after a short reign, by Omar, and he by Ottman—Ali being defeated in the election because he would not pledge himself to abide by the legislation of his two predecessors. Ottman was assassinated in 655 A. D. by Mahomet, brother of Ayesha, and some other prominent men whom he had offended.

Twenty-two years had passed since the death of the prophet. During that short period his sect had grown into a mighty empire. The steel-clad cavalry of Persia, and the formidable infantry of Byzantium had alike proved unable to cope with the flying horsemen of Arabia. Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Persia, Bombay had become provinces of the Caliph. The Mediterranean was overspread by Moslem vessels, under the command of Moayah, son and successor of Abu Sofian, who had been Mahomet's greatest enemy.

The usual source of weakness to an oriental power—the prominence of local governors—threatened dominion. Ali, as a great hero, was accordingly chosen Caliph very promptly, though he persisted in refusing to be bound by the acts of his predecessors. He also declined to open an interminable feud among the most powerful families by avenging the death of Ottman. This moderation was turned against him by the intriguing Ayesha. Though her own brother was the principal murderer, she sent the bloody clothes of Ottman to Moayah and other satraps, with vehement exhortations to rebellion, which immediately broke out. Ayesha herself accompanied by some unsuccessful candidates for the Caliphat, hastened from Medina to Basserah, got possession of that city, and soon after fought a battle with Ali, where she appeared in the hottest of the fight, mounted on a camel, which was soon riddled with darts and arrows. She became a prisoner; but the war between Moayah and Ali continued until the death of the latter, five year later. His son Hasson abdicated in favor of Moayah.

Thus the sceptre of Mahomet passed from his posterity to that of his persecutors. Ayesha had only sorrow for the fruit of her plots. Her brother, fighting for Ali, who had condoned his crime, was taken by Moayah's followers and executed for the murder of Otteman.

Ayesha herself died in 680 A. D., at the age of sixty-five. She had lived to see Hassan poisoned through the arts of Yezid, son of Moayah, and her last recorded act was refusing to let the prophet's grandson be buried in his tomb, which she claimed as her own property.

But the feud she had been so active in stirring up continued to divide Islam. The descendants of Fatima became very numerous, and their illustrious origin makes them the only hereditary aristocracy of the east. To this plentiful source of party feeling are added the influence of romantic tradition and of religious dissension. Fatima was the favorite child of Mahomet.† We have the testimony of her enemy Ayesha, that she resembled him in sweetness of temper. When Yezid violated the constitution of Islam by assuming the Caliphat as a matter of hereditary right, Hassein, the surviving son of Ali, was induced to take up arms against him. Surrounded by overwhelming forces, he and his chief followers assumed their best attire, as bridegrooms of the Houris, and went to an heroic death. The head of Hassein was brought to Yezid's general, who smote the lifeless lips with his staff.

"Alas!" exclaimed an aged Arab, "I have seen those lips pressed to those of the prophet."

This was in the very year of Ayesha's death. The fate of Hassein is the one event which, in Asia, has availed to inspire the tragic muse. The anniversary is celebrated by dramatic

> Forgets the Koran in his Mary's smile;

†Mahomet's love for Fatima gave rise to insinuations. I have some where seen a barbarous Latin account of his expressions, upon which this scandal has been founded. Throughout the Mussulman world Fatima has become a name as common as Mary in the Christian.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents

STAMPS are always acceptable to us, so send them along in payment for books and subscriptions. But it is not very conducive to "angelic" sweetness of disposition to open a letter and find stamps plastered over the writing until even the name of the writer is obscured, as sometimes happens. Moral: Fold the stamps in oiled paper.

WHAT DO YOU think of Lucifer? Is it worth reading? Do you want it published? Do you want to see it every week? Or would fortnightly, or monthly, or once a year please you quite as well? If every one of Lucifer's subscribers care enough for it to pay his or her subscription promptly, the paper will be sent on its mission regularly each week. If you do not want the paper you can surely send us a card informing us of that fact.

IN 1875 Austin Kent published a pamphlet on "Free Love," being "a philosophical demonstration of the non-exclusive nature of connubial love; also a review of the exclusive feature of the Fowlers, Adin Ballou, H. C. Wright and Andrew Jackson Davis on marriage." This was considered an important contribution to the literature of that time, but it has been supposed to be out of print for years. At his death Austin Kent left his manuscripts and books to his cousin, Delos Dunton, and among these were a few copies of "Free Love," which pamphlets Mr. Dunton has generously donated to us to be sold for Lucifer's benefit. The book contains 140 pages, four by six inches, and is neatly and attractively printed. Price, 15 cents each.

"THE REGENERATION OF SOCIETY." This address will be printed in pamphlet form if enough copies are ordered to pay for its publication. The price will be ten cents a single copy, or five copies for 25 cents. If you want it published please order early, as the pamphlet will not be published if at least 200 copies are not ordered by June 1. Many people were disappointed because Jean Dejacque's letter to Proudhon was not issued in pamphlet. But they did not order soon enough. If "The Regeneration of Society" is issued in permanent form, the speech on women and the economic question, with which T. B. Wakeman closed the discussion, will appear in the same pamphlet. Do not neglect to order at once if you want this work.

"THADDEUS STEVENS, 'the Great Commoner,'" is the title of a book just published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. In it the author, Samuel W. McCall, tells of Stevens' obscure and poverty-stricken childhood and youth, and draws an affecting picture of his mother's struggles to rear and educate her four sons. Stevens' father disappeared from home when the children were too small to help themselves, and the mother "worked day and night" to provide for her boys. "She succeeded in sending him (Thaddeus) to Peacham Academy, and afterward to Dartmouth College. His gratitude to her seems to have been the nearest approach to sentiment in his long and lonely life." Thus did one woman solve the problem "What will become of the children?" when the father ignored responsibility for the care of his offspring.

Louisiana Notes

THAYER, MISS., May 12, '99.

I must not neglect to make a better report of observations and experiences in the "Crescent City" and at Hammond, La., while on my homeward trip from Florida. As already mentioned, I arrived in New Orleans from Pensacola, Fla., Saturday eve, April 8. My "through ticket" entitled me to a free transfer to the depot of the "I. C." railroad, or to any hotel in the city. I asked to be taken to the home of Capt. J. H. Massie who had invited me to call on him. The "Transfer" men declined to do this, saying it was too far. I then asked to be taken to a good "dollar-a-day" house. I was carried a mile or more and put down at a stylish-looking hotel. When asked to register I said, "It is late—I want no supper. What will be the charge for bed alone?"

"One dollar," was the reply.

I said that I had asked the driver for a "dollar-a-day house."

"This is a dollar-a-day house," very politely rejoined the clerk.

"And you want a dollar for a bed alone?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you can let me have my grip-sack. I will look further."

Walking a block or two I asked a policeman to show me a good medium-priced house. Very civilly he referred me to the "Victoria," on the next corner. Here I found a room and bed for fifty cents, quite as good, no doubt, as the rooms and beds at the hotel I had just left, or at the "Richelieu" where I had paid a dollar for bed two months before, when passing through this city on my way out to Florida.

This little experience, and others like it, convince me that when in a strange city it is better to ask a policeman for information about hotels and boarding houses than to ask of cabmen, commercial travelers, or of railway officials and employes. Most of these have their reasons for "standing in" with certain hotel-keepers. And there is nothing to be wondered at in all this. It is one of the inevitable features of our hand-to-hand and foot-to-foot struggle for existence.

Early Sunday morning I found my way to the home of Brother and Sister Massie, on Bienville avenue and was by them right cordially welcomed and invited to stay as long as I could make it convenient to do so. At three o'clock p. m. we three went to a business meeting of the First Spiritualist Society of New Orleans. After the close of the business meeting I was asked to say a few words. Spoke about fifteen minutes and was then invited to occupy the platform the same evening at eight o'clock. At the appointed hour, Bro. Massie, who is the retiring president of the Society, introduced me in a very neat little speech. I spoke about an hour, chiefly upon the history of Lucifer's work in Kansas and in Chicago, and upon the necessity of the newer and higher education in sex matters. Was listened to with the closest attention by an audience of perhaps one hundred persons, at least half of whom were women. Installation of officers occupied the time that would otherwise have been devoted to discussion.

I found here several former readers and subscribers of Lucifer, and took the names of several more who will hereafter be constant readers. Spent several days in New Orleans, visiting a number of its popular resorts, and had a good view of the city from the top of one of its "sky-scrapers." Among the noticeable features of this historic city are its open sewers, its narrow streets—in the business portion especially, and the fact that the ground on which the city is built is several feet lower than the surface of the Mississippi river at ordinary stage of water. When these facts are considered, the wonder grows, not that New Orleans is scourged at times with yellow fever, but that "yellow Jack," typhoid and malarial fevers are not epidemic here the year round. I am glad to say, however, that the sewers are now being sunk and covered, so that hereafter we may reasonably expect that the death rate of New Orleans will be materially lowered.

Although it may seem an unwarranted digression, I wish here to say a word or two of the "levee" system so characteristic of all the lower Mississippi country. If instead of building levees to confine the great river within its usual channel "The Father of Waters" had been allowed to spread over the country in time of summer rains, leaving its elements of fertility where they would do good, instead of trying to push them out into the Gulf of Mexico, it would have shown much better sense on the part of the people of Louisiana and of the United States generally. Capt. Massie, who has been a close observer of the working of the levee system for many years, estimates that the money paid by the state and national government to maintain these artificial "protectors" would now buy all the lands subject to overflow, at fifty dollars or more an acre, and that the worst feature of it all is that the evil—the danger from inundation—is constantly increased by these efforts towards prevention. The bed of the river itself is constantly being raised by these efforts to confine its waters, thus requiring higher and still higher embankments, and making the damage, the destruction to protected property all the greater when the natural, the inevitable result of artificial confinement occurs.

Is not this an admirable illustration of the working of governmental protection everywhere, in its attempts to promote morality and prevent crime? Does not all governments by authority—by so-called legality—simply create, increase, and make perpetual the very evils they profess to prevent or cure?

From New Orleans I came to Ponchatoula, a small town on the Illinois Central Railway, and made a short call upon our friends at that place. Ponchatoula is well adapted to the business of "truck farming," including the culture of small fruits for the Northern markets. The land is level and easily irrigated by means of flowing wells. All the truck farmers of this region have made money this spring, so I am told. For further information in regard to the advantages offered for settlement in or near Ponchatoula I would refer our readers to Lucifer's good friends and subscribers, Virgie C. Moon and J. Allen Evans.

On Saturday, April 15, in company with the friends just named, I came to Hammond, La., five miles northward from Ponchatoula. At the station we were met by S. O. Bishop, whose name is familiar to many of our readers, and by him was conducted to the home of the Hewetts, "nurserymen" who came from Waupun, Wisconsin, a few years ago, and have established here a nursery for the culture and sale of fruit trees, vines, flowering plants, etc. They are getting their grounds in good shape, and would have made considerable money this year from the sale of orange trees, as well as from the ordinary nursery stocks, had it not been for the exceptional weather in February last, which killed most of their young orange trees.

On Sunday afternoon a parlor meeting was arranged for me by our earnest co-workers here, which proved to be one of the most interesting and enjoyable meetings of the kind it has been my privilege to attend since leaving Chicago. At eight o'clock the same evening I attended, by special invitation, a "circle" at the house of a neighbor and friend of the Hewetts, at which I heard some very excellent discourses upon the practical affairs of life, given, it is claimed, by ex-carnate human spirits through the mediumship of incarnate human spirits.

After a very enjoyable visit of three days with our Hammond friends I took train for Thayer, Miss., at which place I am still sojourning, but expecting soon to be again on my way towards St. Louis and thence to the great "Windy City" on the shore of Lake Michigan.

As to health, am glad to be able to report a steady gain, as I think, but so slow as to be at times almost imperceptible. The air and water of this place seem to be well adapted to promote health and strength in the chronic invalid. For some weeks past my cardiac and gastric symptoms have been decidedly better, so that I begin to entertain more sanguine hopes of complete recovery than ever before since my departure from home in January last.

M. HARMAN.

An Abused Husband Seeks Advice.

"A Son of Toil" sends us a tale of trials and tribulations. He writes from London saying that he accidentally found a copy of Lucifer and felt impelled to give a history of his matrimonial infelicities. As the story takes about twelve hundred words in the telling, however, I shall not give space to it in full.

About fifteen years ago he "courted" a young woman whom he desired to marry in spite of the fact that "in many ways she was rather peculiar," at times being "dull, uninteresting, unsympathetic, peevish, irritable, often not keeping her word." "The courtship," we are told, "was marked by constant snarling. At times she would swear eternal affection, though she showed little affection for me."

Not a very attractive picture, truly, and one would suppose he would be glad to have such a disagreeable sweetheart taken off his hands. But no. She fell in love with a bar tender and "jilted" our "Son of Toil." The bar tender promised to marry her, but failed to do so. She returned to her first lover, who proved to be as forgiving as "Josler Joe," and they were married.

Her home life was not attractive. "Her mother was a drunkard, and raised Hell," our friend tells us, which "caused her father to drink, and made things ten times worse. Ultimately her father deserted her mother, leaving the woman with three young children and herself to support." (By the way, this drunken man and woman were married, we are told; but for all that, the marriage license does not appear to have provided for the children to any great extent). Our friend discovered that his wife suffered from epileptic fits, and her disagreeable traits developed under the influence of matrimony. He permitted two of her sisters to make their home with them, and they, too, drank. His mother-in-law added to the sweetness of his home life by calling on him when she was drunk and "abusing" him. It seems that the entire family are subject to epilepsy and alcoholism.

The unfortunate husband is groping blindly in the dark, and asks the advice of Lucifer's editors and readers. He says:

"The other day I read of a man in America who objected to his wife wearing corsets. She insisted on wearing them, so after he had been disobeyed two or three times he packed up and left her for good. Do you blame that man? I don't; but what would the corset hater have said if his wife had been out all day drinking, and after a day's hard work he had prepared supper for her and himself, and after waiting, waiting, she rolled home drunk at one o'clock in the morning, and told him to go to hell—she hated him, etc., I wonder what the man who didn't like stays would say? Now let your readers be my judges. Should I lead this life to my death, or shall I say good-bye to it all forever, and try to end my days in happiness and peace? I shall be most glad to hear the opinion of 'Various Voices.'"

It is rather unusual for a woman to "roll home drunk at one o'clock in the morning." But there are many women who toil all day over the wash tub, then prepare supper for a husband who does not come, but rolls home drunk in the early morning. I do not think it is any more the duty of a man to live with and support a drunken woman than it is the duty of a woman to live with and support a drunken man. It is not good for the moral development of either man or woman to be exempted from the natural consequences of invasive actions, as they are in marriage.

Edward Truelove.

Another veteran in the battle for free expression is gone. On Tuesday, April 25, Edward Truelove was buried in Highgate Cemetery, London. He had lived nearly ninety years. "For the last four weeks," says G. W. Foote, "his mind has been clouded.

"His interest in human affairs was unabated until death attacked the citadel of the brain; he had lived long enough to witness the comparative triumph of the principles he had espoused; he saw that society had improved in many ways during the seventy years he had been actively upon the scene; and he must have felt that some measure of that improvement, however small, was due to his own exertions.

"Mr. Holyoake, in the brief address which he wrote to be read at Edward Truelove's graveside, rightly emphasized the dead man's courage. It was not of the noisy order. It was not Donnybrook Fair valor. He never courted martyrdom, but when it visited him it found him quietly unflinching. Nor did he make the slightest parade of his sufferings; he bore them manfully and soberly, counting them honorable, and knowing they were an investment, sure of a dividend, for the cause of liberty, which he values above everything else on earth, except the humanity to which it ministers. Many times he was in peril as the publisher of advanced movements, but it was not until he was nearly seventy that he fell into the clutches of bigotry, and tasted the refined cruelty of the plank bed in a Christian jail. His crime was the publication of a Malthusian pamphlet, which had been sold openly and without molestation for forty years, and which was actually written by a publicist who had been a United States ambassador in London. They tried him for this crime in the Court of Queen's Bench, where the jury would not agree to a verdict; then they took him to the Old Bailey, where they secured a verdict, and obtained a sentence upon him of four months' imprisonment like a common thief. When the brave old man came out of prison he was splendidly greeted by thousands at St. James's Hall, and the testimonial presented to him was doubtless very welcome to one whose whole life had been more or less a hard struggle. He returned to his shop and plodded along in the good old way, doing something unostentatiously every day for the world's freedom and progress.

"Physical courage, especially in crowds, is common enough. Millions of men will fight and die for almost anything, or nothing. But the moral courage is rare. Few men are able to stand against the mob, fewer still are able to stand, if need be, alone, with their feet upon the rock of principle and their face towards a hostile world. Edward Truelove was one of the few. When he stood for what he saw to be truth he was as stubborn as a hill, and nearly as quiet in his resistance. He asked no one but himself whether he was right. His own intelligence was his light, his own conscience was his guide. For seventy years of manhood he never wavered. And for this, if for nothing else, let him be honored. It might be his epitaph—'He was a brave man where so many were cowards.'

"But he had other titles to esteem. Professor Beesly well said that Edward Truelove was naturally an altruist. He was full of public spirit and at the same time kind, and gentle and considerate to all around him. The note of selfishness never rang from his nature. He saw his own good in the good of others. It was a pleasure to see him at meetings. A childlike happiness lighted up his features. Even towards the very end he would come out, when it was really dangerous for him to be from home, and make one at a meeting where liberty was being championed. 'You ought not to be here,' the present writer said to him at such a meeting not so very many months ago, and the brave old man's reply was unanswerable, 'I felt I must come.' 'I think I'll go,' he added, 'after you've spoken.' But he didn't go. He sat on and listened approvingly. The life of his life was devotion to his principles.

"Edward Truelove lived so long that many persons fancied he was dead. To these the report of his death and burial will come as a surprise. The younger generation scarcely knew him. He belonged to the past—the past of storm and peril, when the soldiers of freedom arose almost every day to meet a fresh difficulty or a new danger. He lived right through the heroic age of English liberty. He had seen William Cobbet; he knew Robert Owen; he stood beside Watson, Southwell, Hetherington and the rest, in their fight for a free press; he loved the unsubduable Richard Carlile; he had some intimacy with John Stuart Mill, he was a friend of George Jacob Holyoake in his fighting days; Karl Marx held meetings at his house; the Positivists were indebted to him for hospitality; and he was a staunch supporter of the great Charles Bradlaugh. He was one of the Old Guard—the Old Guard that never knew surrender. A few of them still remain amongst us, to shame our weakness and cowardice, to stimulate our strength and courage. One by one they disappear, leaving the world the poorer for their absence. Hats off to the veterans! And a last salute over the open grave of one of the truest that ever drew breath."

Letter from England.

[The following extracts from a private letter writen to an American friend, will, I think, interest Lucifer's readers. About a year ago I visited the Brotherhood Colony at Purleigh, to which she refers, and was charmed with it. I have wanted to write about it, but hesitated, feeling my inability to do the subject justice. L. H.]

Gloucester, April 30, My Dear Comrade:—You will see from the above that I am in Gloucester. You may have heard about the colony down here from Lillian Harman. This is a thoroughly anarchistic colony, and not a would-be one. Several of the people down here are Tolstoists, but they all agree on the great main question—absolute individual liberty for everyone—and they practice it too. It makes me feel as if I am living in Morris's "News from Nowhere;" it is thorough anarchist-communism. They have destroyed their rights to the land and refused to pay the taxes. Of course the government may at any moment take the land from them, so that its no joking matter. But they have resolved not to go back to the commercial system, even if they have to go on the road and beg.

There is no exclusion; the place is open to everybody. This is practice—last how long it will, it will be perfect of its kind, and also a success.

The sole fault with most colonies is the strong desire of making it economically successful. But that does not serve the purpose—they are not living up to their principles. Wherever one may be, under whatever conditions and circumstances one may be placed, one can always practice one's principles, and if a colony fails to do that, be it as successful in every other way as possible, to my mind it will remain a failure. The large amount of brotherhood existing among these people wins outsiders. They get the people around interested—thereby doing heaps of propaganda.

I have been staying here a short time, and am delighted with the place. It is almost right away from "our glorious civilization." The country around is beautiful. It fills one with deep emotion to live amongst everything that is pure and natural. To see animal life in all its naive freedom; to see spring first reveal herself; to watch the flowers and find new ones spring up each day; the different shades of green that can be seen from the hilltops, the serene calmness of all this splendor makes one feel happy. To watch the beautiful sunset and then to see the stars coming out one by one until they are numberless makes one feel so near nature; it makes one feel that one is a part of nature. Everything in nature is beautiful and free—and above all to think of the people one is living amongst (down here) gives one fresh hopes of a better world to come! To think of the town people, of the large manufacturing dens, of the slums that people are living in, half-starved men, women and children who are sunk low, low in the depths of degradation and misery. What happiness can these poor wretches know of? How can they be brought to see their own wretchedness? Is it true that they see it themselves and won't help themselves? No! this generation is sunk too low to be capable of any rebellion. It is the new generation that we want to get at—the new generation that we hope for—that generation will outlive the old, and another take its place still in advance of the former, and so on, until man has reached a perfect state of development. The thinking animal man is at the present day living worse than the lower animal species.

How I long to do something to satisfy my desire of helping others. Don't think I am pretending to be an altruist, because

I don't believe such a thing exists. I'm an egoist in every sense of the word. Everything I do is entirely to my own satisfaction. It makes me happy to see others happy, and therefore I do all I can to procure that happiness.

When I said, "I will do all I can for the movement," I meant it in a very egoistical form, because I derive a great deal of pleasure in imparting to others things I believe to be right.

One never stops to think as to whether an act is going to be beneficial to himself or not when one has to decide on the impulse of the moment. When a man or a child is drowning you don't stop to think as to whether you are going to save the man's or child's life for your personal pleasure, because if you did it might make it too late to do the act. We judge the nature of the act by its motive; we know whether an act is right or wrong by its results, but the motive generally decides that too. Because the result may not always be as desired, and the motive may have been of the highest kind.

I nearly always act by instinct, but I never regret what I have done, as my instinct is guided by my reasoning power, so that I can always trust myself. Now I hope you won't run away with the idea that I pretend to be an altruist.

As to the kind of work I'm doing, I will gladly tell you. I have been working in a huge commercial firm that I could not take an interest in. Making gorgeous fur opera cloaks and capes and jackets, etc., etc., was not very interesting to me. I did not like my fellow-workmen, nor did they like me. I was a sort of machine from 8:30 a. m. to 6 p. m. I did not work quite so hard as most girls do, but the conditions under which I was working were detestable to me. I have given it up, in the hope of finding some kind of work that I can take an interest in. At present I am taking a holiday, but will soon return to London.

I got the four copies of Lucifer containing the translation of Joseph De Jacques' letter to Proudhon. It is a splendid letter, and I think will do a great deal of good. I went into ecstacies over it. One other letter I liked very much indeed is M. Florence Johnson's answer to "Future Men and Women not Lovers." I have heard a great deal about her from W. F. Barnard and I should very much like to meet her. Barnard is doing a lot of work down in the Provinces organizing "The Free Discussion League," lecturing and debating, working on the "Truth Seeker," and doing divers other things. He has created a stir in the Provinces. I think he is going to London May 5.

exhibitions of constantly increasing magnificence, which combine the pathos of the mimic stage with the peculiar powers of a great religious solemnity.

"After the lapse of twelve centuries," says Macauley, "the recurrence of this solemn season excites the fiercest and saddest emotions in the bosoms of the devout Moslem of India. They work themselves up to such agonies of rage and lamentation, that some, it is said, have given up the ghost from the mere effect of mental excitement."

The last words of Hassein, "From God do we come, and to him we shall return," became the formula of the Shute sect, which prevails in India and Persia. Its tendencies are pantheistic and philosophical. From it has preceded all the innovating schools of Mussulman piety down to that of Bab, which is the oriental phase of modern liberalism. The Shutes regard the first three Caliphs as usurpers, and Ali as the first true successor of Mahomet. The more orthodox Sunite sect, comprising the Turks, Arabs and Kurds, is virtually the Ayesha sect; for the modest and conservative character of Abu Beker would have produced no such effects as the passions of his energetic daughter.

It is not without reason that Ayesha, after all these ages, stands thus at the head of Mussulman orthodoxy. All the wives of Mahomet remained widows, in compliance with what was supposed to be his will, but the one who had "compromised his honor" during life is the only one who has received any special reverence, because on the whole she deserved it best.

The historian, seeking original sources of information in Gibbon, Irving, Gobineau, Alufeda and other authorities on Moslem origins and evolution, will find that almost all we learn about Mahomet's personal character and private life is traceable in the first instance to Ayesha. She alone possessed the keys of his mind, because she only had braved his sensitive jealousy and subdued it. By virtue of this red light in her brief married life it is that her elongated shadow extends across a millenium and a half of conquest marvelously achieved, of reverses stoically borne, of regeneration opposed with pristine bigotry, of success in regions beyond what the prophet's own prescience could reach.

"What in the midst of that mighty drama," as George Eliot said on a similar occasion, "are girls and their blind visions? They are the yea and nay of that good for which men are enduring and fighting. In their delicate vessels is borne onward through the ages the treasure of human affections."

VARIOUS VOICES.

Yuma:—Will you please suggest in your paper the expediency or necessity of forming societies in rural districts for the prevention of cruelty to wives and children from their so-called lawful and natural protectors—husbands and fathers? And will you be kind enough to suggest a plan for the formation of such societies, for by-laws and practical methods for running and maintaining the same?

J. H. Dreher, Scranton, Pa.—Enclosed you will find one dollar, which kindly apply on my subscription to the Light Bearer. I am glad that you did not erase my name as soon as term of subscription expired. I hope you will continue to do the same in the future, as I would not like to lose one number. It sometimes happens that a person cannot send money at the time, and by holding his name you keep a customer. Now you just send the paper until I notify you to stop (that is providing you can stand it). I would very much like to hear a lecture on free love or treating on the sex question, but Scranton seems to be boodooed. There are some liberal people here, but when it comes to freedom of sex they are not in it (to use a common expression). I know one woman who says she would not allow her husband to read Lucifer, and she considers herself very far ahead in the liberal line. And my male companions imagine when I express my views on these matters that my lecherous thought prompts me to speak in the manner I do; but for all that I keep hammering away, and in time we will get them on the higher track. Hope that Mr. Harman will come home improved in health.

Alfreda, Thayer, Miss.—I earnestly wish that all sex radicals who write for Lucifer—and some of them are very able writers—would make their articles more suitable for propaganda work. Or should we have an occasional edition of the paper prepared with special reference to the needs of those whose eyes cannot yet endure the unveiled rays of the Light Bearer? The law of magnetic attraction and repulsion is little understood, and the masses of people are afraid to investigate for themselves. I know many good women who would gladly learn something concerning the sex problem if it could be presented in a way to make them see that it was really a reform. As it is we dare not hand out the paper to our neighbor, who is starving for the information it contains, lest she be offended and repelled by the thorough-going manner in which the vitally important subjects are handled; especially we cannot give it to our God and government worshipping neighbors. Is the talismanic phrase free love so dear to the hearts of sex radicals that they will not substitute some name less terrible to the average reader?—some term that will appeal to the reason of all sensible persons and yet not shock their prejudices?

The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

At last we have a cheap and good American edition of this incomparable creation of the Astronomer-Poet of Persia, as rendered into English verse by Edward Fitzgerald. Once read, "The Rubaiyat" is read again and again and each time with new insight and delight.

It is the wish of Swinburne that the rich gift of Omar Khayyam of Naish apur may "be tasted in that most exquisite English translation, sovereignly faultless in form and color of verse, which gives to those ignorant of the East a relish of the treasure and a delight in the beauty of its wisdom." With sketch of Omar's life. Symbolical cover. Price 10 cents. Address M. Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thraldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

The following by WILLIAM DENTON, pioneer Freethought and Spiritualist lecturer, and naturalist, who died while on a journey of scientific research in the wilds of Australia some fifteen years ago, are of as vital importance now as when they were written:

Sermons from Shakespeare's Text: "Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything."

Orthodoxy False, Since Spiritualism is True.
The God Proposed for Our National Constitution.
What is Right?
Man's True Saviors.
Christianity No Finality or Spiritualism Superior to Christianity.
Who are Christians?

WOMAN IN THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE. Woman was the first human being that tasted bondage. Woman was a slave before the slave existed. The basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor. This has been the condition of woman in the past and is so still. She is now a slave of the slave. This work is August Bebel's masterpiece. 8vo. 172 pages. Price 25 cents.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 20 cents per dozen.

KAREZZA Ethics of Marriage.
A bold, brave book teaching ideal marriage, rights of the unborn child, a designed and controlled maternity.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS, by Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of "Louise Bayer" on Men and Women; and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 256 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. The Missing Link Modern Spiritualism. By A. Leah Underhill. A book for all spiritualists and investigators. "Hear all sides, then decide." 23 chapters; 478 pages; 16 illustrations, including portraits of the Fox family. History of the Hydesville rappings, as given by eye-witnesses, the threats or mob violence; remarkable and well-attested manifestations; the "exposures" disposed of, etc. Handsomely bound in cloth. Publishers price, $1.50. On receipt of $1.27, and 13 cents for postage, we will send the book to any address.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Herodian on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs, Contains matter pertaining to the Legitimation League and the Personal Rights Association of England. Also, four fine full page portraits of Ezra H. Heywood, Moses Harman, Lillian Harman and Lois Waisbrooker, together with sketches of their personalities and work. By Oswald Dawson. Neatly bound boards. Price, 20 cents. Address Moses Harman, 507 Carroll Ave., Chicago.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 340 pages. Price 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

Religion and Rationalism The relation of each to human liberty and progress. The religionist, fancying that he has the whole truth, is logically opposed to investigation. The rationalist, believing that he has no final truth, welcomes the discovery of new truths. LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 20. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MAY 27, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 763

Love.

Love is but a great desire—
Coarse, refined, or low or higher;
Love is like the leaping fire,
Warmth and light, or scorchings dire.

Love gives blindness, insight plain,
Worth or weakness, loss or gain,
Sweetest pleasure, saddest pain,
Thrilling heart, or bursting brain.

Love is pureness, love is lust,
Brutal rape, or restful trust;
Grants full freedom, or says "Must,"
Lifts aloft or drags in dust.

Love is what the nations need,
Love has made the nations bleed;
Love of all things holds the seed—
Love the flower, love the weed.

There is then a lower love
Nobler souls will rise above:
To the passion that is higher,
Wiser souls will aye aspire.

The Regeneration of Society.*

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

(Concluded).

A great deal of sentiment is indulged in regarding the relation of husband and wife, and proudly praised is the protection guaranteed the woman when she gives herself in marriage. Yes, she gives herself away it is true. She gives her person, her children, her property to a man when she takes the marriage vow. Stripped of the tinsel of false pretence, this is the ugly fact. It is well and truly expressed by an eastern judge whose advice was asked by a Colonel Walker who, when a poor man years ago married a wealthy woman, who, after supporting him many years, sought a divorce from him. The case was reported a few months ago in the New York papers. This learned judge—who, by the way, bears the euphonious name of Bumpus—asks, "What are the relations of the husband toward his wife and his household?" and answers the question in these words:

"The answer is the simplest one possible. He is the head of the house, in fact as well as in name. He can direct how they are to live, where they are to live, and every circumstance whatsoever must be under his direction and supervision. If he should say to his wife, 'You must live in this place,' it is her duty to submit. If he should say, 'The children cannot remain in my house, but must live elsewhere,' that must be done. In all questions relating to hospitality, selection of guests, and in fact everything that concerns the home, he is in fact the master. The law regards him as the controlling factor, and in all particulars the wife must submit.

"When it comes to the question of the assertion of authority there is no doubt regarding your position, nor is the position in the least changed by the fact that the property stands in your wife's name or that it was purchased with her money. In all particulars you are master and she must submit.

"As the Supreme Court says, you are 'head of the family, master of the house.' You clearly have the power to say where she shall live, can dictate to her as to the style and fashion of her surroundings, the care and custody of minor children, and in everything pertaining to your family she is to accept your directions. This sounds harsh, but I am speaking as a lawyer."

And that is the way our boasted protection protects us.

The social system is diseased. The blood needs to circulate unrestrainedly. The pure air should be breathed freely in order that the poison may be expelled. But the body is covered with the plasters and bandages of law; the eyes are blindfolded by the bands of ignorance and superstition. Whenever a new pain is felt, yet another tightly-twisted bandage must be applied in the stupid effort to benumb the pain.

As I have said, the property qualification in marriage is offered as a new protective measure. Away with all such palliatives! Throw off the disease-and-death-producing restrictions and let us stand free men and free women. Let women have freedom of choice and let them take the responsibility of that choice.

I believe in the property qualification for parentage, but not for marriage. This qualification, however, should be decided on by the mother, and not by the state. To me it seems, to say the least, as risky a thing to bring a new life into existence without means of support as it would be to undertake to build a house without having any idea where the money to pay for the material is to come from, or to engage in any other business enterprise without sufficient capital. And this is my most important contention against legal marriage. It entraps the woman with the alluring promise that if she lives in accordance with its requirements she may be sure of support for herself and for her children. But in case of desertion, or disability, or death of her husband, she is left helpless. The property requirement, even if practicable, would be a very slight palliative of the evil.

If, instead of depending on the marriage system, a woman were free to bear, or to refrain from bearing, children at will, is it probable that she would bear more than she could see a reasonable prospect of supporting?

Fancy an unmarried man saying to an unmarried woman, "I love you. I have no property, and barely sufficient salary to support myself. To prove my love to you I propose that you give to me your liberty. You will give your time to the care of my home. We will procreate children at haphazard, and for protection we will depend on the special providence that is said to guard fools and children."

Would not that be a preposterous proposition? Yet, stripped of the illusory glamor of the marriage superstition, wherein does it differ from proposals made and accepted by countless men and women every day?

*A paper read before the Manhattan Liberal Club, New York, April 1, '99.

If a girl were brought up with any rational knowledge of herself and of the pains and perils as well as the pleasures of maternity, the dangers of indiscriminate procreation in her case would be reduced to a minimum. She would understand that the responsibilities of maternity are not to be entered upon lightly; and if a man should urge her to assume such responsibilities she could as reasonably and as properly ask him what proportion of the cost he is able and willing to assume, as she might if he were to make any other proposition which, to accept, might involve considerable outlay of time and money.

As an illustration of the inefficacy of legal enactments in regulating reproduction of the human race, let me call your attention to the negroes of America. There have been stringent laws against miscegenation ever since negro slaves were brought from Africa to America, and what is the fruit of those laws? Rarely, if ever, do you see a full-blooded negro, and in many instances the Caucasian blood predominates. Instead of leaving women, white and black, in possession of their own bodies, with freedom to accept or reject any proposition from any man, the black woman was the slave of the master whose name she bore, just as the white wife took the name of the husband and belonged to him. Neither white nor black woman belonged to herself. I do not mean to assert that the absence of law would have prevented miscegenation; but I do maintain that the law did not prevent it. I am also confident that had the black woman been free, even though ignorant, there would not have been as great a mixture of the blood of the African and Caucasian races as exists today. In presenting these facts I do not wish to be understood as either advocating or opposing miscegenation. I merely use the illustration to show how utterly powerless such laws are to accomplish their purpose.

Sojourner Truth, who was born a slave, and who, by her simple, homely eloquence, did so much to remove the yoke of bondage from her fellow-slaves, hit the nail on the head in an incident witnessed and reported by Moses Hull.

One day, many years ago, two swaggering young men came into the railroad station at Battle Creek, Michigan, where Sojourner lived and where she was known and loved by all. They took seats, and were enjoying themselves in the manner of their species, when an old black auntie came and took a seat beside them. They hastily arose, and one exclaimed in indignation:

"What! do you suppose I would sit by a nigger?"

Sojourner smiled, and in her quiet way remarked,

"Lord bless you, honey, if all the white men had been as afraid to sit beside a nigger as you are, we wouldn't have bleached out so!"

Marvel not that I say unto you ye must be born again. The salvation of our race must rest in the hand of our descendants. Hence the necessity of the proper instruction in the sacredness of the sexual functions. What and how to teach the children concerning the sexual functions is one of the most perplexing problems which many persons who really desire to be progressive along the lines of social evolution have to confront. If we teach them the truth, if we answer their questions frankly, we are told that we thereby rob them of the innocence which is inseparable from ignorance. We are asked to believe that the functions of our beings which called our loved ones into existence are so vile, so despicable, that the children born thereof will lose respect for us if we frankly tell them the truth. Hydra-headed Mystery, mated with darkest Ignorance, parents of cowering Fear, have ever been the servants of the priest and the king. Without these three the Church and the State would crumble into dust. And to serfdom to these shadows of the night we are asked to give our children.

What would be thought of parents who would neglect to give their children the benefit of their experience in matters of deportment, bodily cleanliness, diet and things of like nature? Yet immeasurably more deplorable is the conspiracy of silence agreed on by society regarding sex relations. Ignorance, Mystery, Fear! To you do we offer up our children. We tell our children to avoid certain errors, but we give them no rational reason for doing so. Always we appeal to the phantoms of Shame and Disgust.

Let us picture a child sent out into the darkness of night. The moon feebly shines through hazy clouds and the landscape is lost in shadow. The father says to the child:

"There is a pathway which, if you are wise, you will follow. On either side are brambles and ditches. You will occasionally find boulders in the path over which you may stumble and fall if you do not look closely."

But a friend stands by and says:

"What! will you rob your child's journey of all its romance? Would you destroy the illusions of youth? What is life for a child without its fairy tales? It will learn the truth soon enough when it finds itself wallowing in the muck and mire of the ditch. Tell it fairy tales which it may enjoy as it goes. I tell my child to keep its eyes turned to heaven—it is so vulgar and degrading to look under foot. I say, 'My dear, do you see those dark scurrying shadows in the moonlight? They are goblins that will get you if you turn either to the right or to the left. The pathway is hard and rough, I know, and on either side of it the way is smooth and pleasant to the feet; but under peril of damnation in this world and in the world to come, you must walk in the way I have pointed out to you.'"

Would not such warning result in the very evil sought to be avoided? If the way is rough to the feet, all the greater is the necessity for keeping the eyes turned in that direction. Humanity has been star-gazing, has been ghost and goblin-gazing, too long. If there is any good reason why certain actions should be performed, or other actions avoided, let us give these reasons to our children in a manner as plain and simple as possible. The ghost stories and the fairy tales belong to the past, and in the past they should be left.

When the ideal of freedom is advocated it is objected that liberty means license. This is a mistake. Liberty and license are absolutely and irreconcilably opposed to each other. Liberty means equality of rights. License means a special privilege. If one person has a license which gives him a special privilege to invade the liberty of another person, the invaded one's liberty is but an empty name.

How can there be freedom of conscience in religion in a country where one church has a special license, as in Russia?

How can we have individual liberty of choice of treatment when we must go only to regularly licensed doctors of medicine, as in the United States.?

How could the black woman choose whether her children should be black or yellow when a white man held a license which gave him the ownership of her person?

How can the white woman do the best work toward the regeneration of the race when her husband holds a legal license which bars her from the liberty of choosing when she shall bear children, under what conditions she shall bear them, and how many children she shall bear?

Millions of men and women have suffered, have been tortured in every conceivable way, and have died, because of rebellion against legally licensed religion. Even in America today men are in prison because they refused to yield their liberty to perform useful labor on Sunday. The preachers want a licensed monopoly of the right to get their living on that day.

We see the same result when license interferes with liberty to heal, or attempt to heal the sick. No matter how successful men and women may be, how much the people may desire their services, arrest and robbery and imprisonment are their threatened punishment if they do not possess the government license.

Under equal freedom and opportunity there is the greatest possible incentive to improvement. But with the law-enforced advantage of a licensed position, more than half that incentive is removed.

And what shall we say of the influence of license in the sex relations of men and women? Licentiousness is a term greatly abhorred, yet that is what we have when liberty is denied.

Invasion of woman by man outside of the marriage pale is a horrible crime, which is legally punished by imprisonment, but the sense of the community revolts against the outrage so strongly that it frequently ignores the law and hangs or burns the invader.

But let the invader be licensed by law, and the woman has no liberty and is therefore not invaded. Her person is not her own, and she has no right to the control of herself. When a mob hangs a man for outraging a woman who is not his wife, the papers are full of details of the crime and its punishment, and the sympathies of the community are with the mob. But let an editor dare to call attention to a licensed outrage, and the prison doors yawn to receive him.

Do not think I am here to advocate or to condemn any school of medicine, or religion or morals. I am here to plead for freedom of choice in all these. I do not share the feeling of those who fear that if we dispel the horror of hell, we shall be left out in the cold.

It must not be forgotten that only through unobstructed development can evolution do its perfect work, and through growth in freedom only, can come the true regeneration of society. Our work should be to help clear the way, to help to remove the debris, the gods and ghosts, the superstitions and prejudices of the past, in order that the light of reason may shine freely in the lives of those who are to live when we are dust.

Comments on Contents of "the Best Issue."

BY C. L. JAMES.

No. 756 was the best issue of Lucifer ever printed. Naturally, what I wrote contributed to make it so; but that let some one else criticise.

R. B. Kerr's "Causes of Progress" was strong meat. Like everything he writes it was coherent, consecutive, radical and intelligible, consequently instructive to readers who have still the elements of evolutionary science to learn, and there are many such among those interested in sexual and economic freedom. Nevertheless I could make a few criticisms. Such important words as "progress" and "superstition" lack definition as bad as they do in Buckle; and similarly they introduce a sort of half-bakedness into the fibre. I'm afraid Mr. Kerr reads the evolutionary writers too much in the spirit of a disciple, and might profit by the antiseptic of that anarchistic literature whose sources were transcendental. He does not seem to doubt that Buckle, Herbert Spencer, Bagehot, Darwin and Westermaarck, are sacred writers of equal authority, who may be used as an orthodox theologian uses Paul, Jeremiah and the author of the "Book of Esther." The truth is that from Spencer to Bagehot is a transition as disconcerting as from Paul to Calvin. It is passing from a great original thinker whose ideas are valuable not for their absolute correctness, but their fruitful suggestions, to a system-monger, who forges the bars and chains of a new prison from such material as he can use among the files and saws with which his prophet cut out an old one.

I don't believe I wrote "Columbus' plan of reaching the West Indies by sailing west." It was the East Indies Columbus expected to reach that way, and this is what made the paradoxical originality of his project.

"Straws," like the "Claimants of the Purse" in "Munsey's" are well worth any radical journal's marking as they whistle down the wind. I have known male claimants for a purse of the same kind, under like conditions.

M. Florence Johnson appears to be a new Richmond in the field. We shall be glad to hear from her again.

Adeline Champney contributes valuable matter to one of the most important departments of the anarchistic work—the critical—which has been neglected.

"Coming Out," by Albina L. Washburn is what we sorely need in the hard struggle against environing stupidity—a glimpse of light illuminating recently opened vistas whose existence we are apt to pass unnoticed in the gloom.

Jay Chaapel evidently can write a very pretty parable.

Hosea McCoy is no doubt justified in confining his strictures to the matter of certain would-be radical publications, especially as he touches the style, in passing, with such gentle irony. But the style is not quite a trifle. What reader of alleged anti-Philistine periodicals does not know the style I mean? The style, not to be personal, which is marked by such idioms as "thuswise," "p. d. q.," "logodædaly," "lexiphanicism," "heterophemy," such complicated metaphors as "generate the moral breadth which is the ethical balance wheel;" such "bracing" "pungencies" as "blasphemous old brute," and "beer-buttressed vaudeville show." All this is not in the least original. It is a growing, but most execrable fashion. It is a mixture of two styles which were both barbarous at their best—a hotch-potch of Carlyle and "Brick" Pomeroy. To every young journalist who aims at anything higher than the mountebank's ambition of making a sensation, I advise as follows: Shut up your Artemus Ward, burn your Danbury "News," throw away your La Crosse "Democrat," bury your Chicago "Times," forget your Bill Nye, abolish your Doesticks, keep your "Sartor Resartus" for Sunday, don't think you are Emerson, avoid Richard Grant White, take "Tak Kak" for the standard of all you would not resemble. As reading matter some of these have merit, but as models they are, without exception, very bad. If you have no style of your own, read, till you catch their contagion, the great old masters of our prose. Read Dryden, Addison, Bunyan, DeFoe—not for their ideas, some had but few—not for their culture, some had none—but for their manly plainness. Observe, I am not recommending pedantry. The thing I condemn unexceptionally is affectation; and the condemnation of purism consists in just this, that it is an affectation. Mannerism, if natural, is the note of originality. But you attain to classic excellence just when your reader forgets you exist and thinks only of what you express. You attain to unmixed atrocity when he thinks, "That fellow can sling the ink, but I don't quite understand him."

And this reminds me that with No. 756 Lucifer appears to usher in a new era in anarchistic and free love literature—the era of criticism, taste and style. When I began to write in the "Revolution" and the Boston "Investigator," the few radical papers which America, or indeed the world, possessed, were in no position to be choice. Disturbing ideas were wanted. They came jostling each other; there could be no question of style, and not much of soundness. We have got beyond that. The radical papers of today are numerous enough and large enough to float the true daily burden of the radical world. There is no call to fill them up with aimless vaporings, discussions which belong to the past, crudities, tags and rags. Lucifer has risen to the level of the time. It is no longer ephemeral literature. It selects from advanced thought what deserves to live. It can well afford to leave for publications essentially Philistine whatever proposes making the reader open, not his moral, but only his bodily eyes.

Did you observe the articles on Lillian Bell and her famous paper in "Harper's Weekly?" The Harpers began by criticising her; and I wrote them a reply, of which a synopsis, giving my name, was published with comments, 25th ult.

The Savior of His Country.

Behold the man who never fails to vote;
Look at his vest, his trousers and his coat,
And note the chain he wears.
He says "I done" and "They have went,"
And if you were to ask him what he knew
Concerning Homer, Shakespeare or Carlyle,
'Tis safe to bet a dollar to a cent
That he would look at you,
And wrinkle up his brow and think awhile,
And then respond about in this wise: "Say,
What ward does dat duck come from anyway?"
This is the man who always votes and who Assists in making laws to govern you.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CLUB meets every Sunday at 3 p. m., in Masonic Temple, ninth floor; free platform; free discussion; free admission.

OUR FRIENDS and patrons have doubtless been annoyed by my failure to attend promptly to some of their business communications. These delays have been caused by the necessity I have been under to try to attend to more work than I am able to properly manage. The extra work involved in moving and getting settled has very seriously interfered with the regular business, and now it may be necessary for me to further try the patience of our friends. My little daughter is ill with scarlet fever, and under the circumstances it is easier for me to neglect Lucifer than to neglect her. However, I trust the delay will not be serious; but I think it best to make this explanation publicly rather than to attempt to make many privately.

The Social Conscience and Economic Equality.

In last week's Lucifer Lillian quotes from a private letter written by a "prominent socialist author" in which the writer says:

"Still I think the slavery of women lies deeper than the social conscience. I think that economic equality will free them and abolish marriage."

This is, in part at least, the view taken by Mr. J. C. Jeffcott, a prominent economic reformer, in his criticism upon my socialist talk at Tampa, Fla., of which a brief report was given in a recent Lucifer. So also thought Mrs. Emma J. Huff, Vice-President of the Southern Cassadaga Spiritualist Association, who criticised my talk at Lake Helen, Fla., and so also thinks Mrs. C. M. Tregear, of Wellesley, Mass., who in a letter to Lucifer—see 754—takes sides with Mrs. Huff, and who sharply criticises my little pamphlet entitled "Motherhood in Freedom."

That all of these more or less friendly critics are honest and sincere in the views advocated by them is reasonably certain; and that the many thousands of socialist readers and writers who agree with them are also honest and sincere goes without saying. That they are all well-informed, clear-headed and logical in their premises and in their conclusions, is not so certain to some of us who are also socialists in the widest and best sense of the word.

Let us see about this. Let us for a little while be skeptics in the true and etymologic sense of that much-abused word—that is, let us look about us; let us investigate; let us lay aside prejudice; let us take nothing on trust or hearsay. In the first place, what do we mean by the terms "social conscience" and "economic equality?"

The word social and socialist are derived from socius, "a companion;" hence every one who wants a companion, every one who does not want to live alone, is a socialist. The word conscience is derived from con, "with," or "together with," and scire, "to know;" hence, etymologically, conscience means to know with or together with another, or with others; and therefore, if there were but one person in the world there would be no conscience. Conscience, then, is of itself socialistic, and there is really no conscience but the more or less social conscience. The definitions in the books are largely misleading; they are true neither to etymology nor to the facts of daily experience. We are taught to believe that conscience means self-knowledge. That it is an innate faculty—that we each possess the power of determining what is right and what is wrong if we will only listen to the "inward monitor." On the contrary, I maintain—from the etymology of the word, and from the facts of every day observation, that conscience, as a guide of conduct, is made up not so much of what we ourselves know, or think we know to be right, as of what we think other people think to be right! In certain old histories we read of a court officer called the "keeper of the king's conscience." How many of us can claim to be the keepers of our own consciences? and how many of us habitually "let out the job" to the Grundys,—male or female—or to the priest, the parson, the political boss, the "hero of the hour," whoever that hero may be? In that part of the social conscience called religious conscience, the standard of authority is still farther away. In this case we are governed not by what we ourselves think to be right, not by what our parson thinks to be true and right, but by what our parson thinks that God thinks about the matter!

Coming back now to the words of our socialist author: "The slavery of women lies deeper than in the social conscience," etc. To my thinking there can be no deeper cause of social or ethical wrong than an abnormal social conscience itself. The beginning of reform in any department of life must be in the conscience, in the sense of right and wrong. Until the social conscience was roused to see the wrong done to the black slaves of the south, nothing could be done to remove that wrong. In time, by the pressure of an enlightened conscience, and by force of military necessity, political and social equality—not political and social freedom—was, in a measure, granted to the blacks, or rather was thrust upon them; but because economic freedom was withheld their modicum of political and social freedom has proved to them a curse rather than a blessing. Now, there is slowly forming in the popular mind a social conscience that demands economic freedom for both the black and the white slaves of our economic slave system—by which I mean the slaveries inherent in our land system, our money system, and our corporate capital system.

It will be observed that I use the phrase economic freedom, instead of economic equality. I think the latter phrase misleading and unscientific. In the nature of things there can be no equality in associative human life, except of opportunity, and this equality can only be approximated, never fully practicalized. Economic equality suggests to the average mind, financial equality, or the forcible "dividing up" of the accumulations of the wealthy, and giving them to the poor.

It is probable, however, that by the phrase "social conscience," our author means that part of the social conscience which may more approximately be called the sexual conscience; that is, the conscience which regulates the ethics of marriage, or of the sexual, the reproductive relations of women and men. If this be his meaning, then the issue is clearly joined; the lines of divergence are plainly defined. I have long taken the ground that we must have sex freedom before we can possibly have economic freedom, or, in fact, before we can have real freedom or justice in any line of associative human life. There is in nature such a thing as order of development—precedence in time, or in periods of growth. If we would have an oak tree we must first have the acorn; next the root; then the stem or body, including branches, leaves and bark; last of all come flowers and fruit. Sexual conscience, sexual freedom and justice bear the same relation to the economic conscience to economic freedom and justice as do the seed and root of the oak tree to the stem and branches.

Marriage means monopoly—exclusive ownership of person—and the conscience that demands this precedes and includes all other reforms. "Sex includes all," says the poet philosopher Whitman; hence we might as well expect to see the stem of an oak tree grow and mature without an acorn or root as to expect economic freedom so long as sex is not free—so long as the mothers of the race are slaves—slaves to man-made laws and to their own abnormal consciences.

"Life is conscience," says Hugo. This ethical aphorism has doubtless been turned up by many plowmen in the field of radical thought. "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world" is another aphorism equally venerable and equally true to nature and to life. Putting these two aphorisms together and we see why it is that we must have sex freedom before we can have economic or any other freedom. Conscience makes or regulates the standard of right and wrong in all associative life, and woman rules the world by making or controlling conscience. Conscience belongs to the realm of the emotions far more than to the realm of abstract reasoning, and woman's nature is far more emotional than man's, hence woman is more conscientious than is man, and therefore harder to be convinced by the stern logic of fact.

Woman's instincts are more aristocratic than are man's; woman is far more opposed to social and political equality, and consequently more opposed to economic freedom and equality of opportunity than is man, for with economic freedom it would be almost impossible to maintain political and social *in*equality. The women of the South were the main support of the "peculiar institution," and refused to be "constructed" or to be reconciled to the results of the war long after their husbands and sons had laid down their arms. A permanently ignorant and permanently serving class, was the Southern woman's social ideal.

And the same is true of the Northern woman of today, with rare exceptions. Men are bad enough in this regard, but they do not usually cossider themselves disgraced by associating on equal footing in the social club, in the ball room, in the home circle, with their employes, as does the society woman when required to associate with her hired girl, her seamstress, her laundress, or with "shop girls" generally. To be obliged to work for one's living is the eternal badge of inferiority in the eyes of the women who have most to do with the making of the social conscience everywhere, and hence the necessity of reforming that conscience before economic freedom can be practicalized. Economic freedom would give to all the opportunity to be self-supporting. This would mean that none would be compelled to serve the society woman for pay, and then that aristocratic personage would be compelled to serve herself, and this would be death to her ladyship's claim over the shop girl or working woman.

But to be above the necessity of working for her living is not woman's chief patent of nobility, or claim to respectability. This patent, this claim, rests chiefly upon her conformity to a sexual conscience or code of morals, imposed upon her, perhaps in the first place, by man himself, but now adopted by her as her dearest earthly possession, as well as one of her most important qualifications for respectability and happiness in the "life beyond;" and that sexual conscience or code of morals is simply this: "Thou shalt not become a mother, nor in any way use the reproductive function until granted permission to do so by church or state authority."

The practical working of this sexual conscience, this artificial or man-made code, is this:

The ruling powers—rulers of church and state—know that the sexual instinct, the reproductive desire or appetite, is one of the most powerful, most imperative, of all the human instincts, desires or appetites, and they know that if they can control the sexual, the mating instinct by artificial restraints they can control or influence the character of the product of this mating instinct. That is to say, these rulers—these power-loving men—know, if they know anything, that through the control of sex they can control the people over whom they wish to rule. Hence the restraints thrown around women in all the past, and in all departments of life compelling her to look to marriage for support and for position in society, and yet denying to her the right to choose her companion, or to get rid of him when he becomes disagreeable to her. She must wait, patiently wait till some man asks her to be his wife, giving her only the beggarly option of acceptance, or of rejection at her peril, since she can never know that another offer will ever be made; and if she accepts she binds herself for life to a man who may prove utterly unfit to make her happy, or to be the father of her children.

These ruling powers bind woman to a life of obedience, making the husband (meaning house-band, or ruler of the house), owner of the "bed and board," to use a legal phrase, although these may both be the product of the labor of the wife—the weaver, as the term originally means; that is, one who clothes the inmates of the house, and who does the menial labor of the house.

The worst feature of all this sad picture, as I have often tried to show in these columns, is that woman's conscience—the chief factor in the general social conscience—accepts, submissively accepts, this position of inferiority in the social equation, and by her attitude of submission, by her surrender of self-ownership in the sex relation, she puts it out of her power to become the mother of self-reliant, self-owning, self-governing children. And with this, another iteration of what I believe to be the most important of demands in the line of ethical reform, I will bring this long letter to a close, viz:

GIVE US FREE MOTHERS; give us Motherhood in Freedom; give us sex reform, and all other reforms will follow.

As Lillian says in last issue, we all "know many women who are not dependent on others for their subsistence who are yet slaves to their own unenlightened conscience, or to the consciences of their neighbors."

To help woman to free herself from thralldom to her own abnormal conscience would seem the first thing of all to be done, in order to inaugurate Motherhood in Freedom and all other reforms dependent on free motherhood. Who will lend a hand in this matter?

Just one word in conclusion in reply to my old friend Cynthia M. Tregear. How you could so misunderstand my little pamphlet as to charge me with representing the emancipated woman as a "dependent weakling" is beyond my comprehension. The exact opposite of weakling was and is my ideal of the emancipated woman. It may be true that my ideal, as therein portrayed is a "foolish dream," as you so flatteringly designate it, and it may be that when I live to see as many years more as I have seen since I left the Methodist Church (near fifty years), as you suggest, I may then be enabled to see things with as clear vision as you now evidently claim for yourself. The pamphlet referred to costs but five cents. We still have a few left, if I mistake not. Those who wish to see for themselves what my ideas are on this question can do so by sending this amount to Lucifer's office.

With best wishes to all, and with the hope soon, with improved health and strength to see the workers in Lucifer's office, and to resume work therein, I remain—for more light, yours,

M. HARMAN.

The Ever-Recurring Question.

One cold day last week when I opened the door in response to a ring at the bell, I saw a small, white-faced, bare-footed boy standing there. He gave me a note which read as follows:

"KIND FRIENDS: Could you please spare a few pennies or some old clothing for my little ones? My husband died in the County Hospital and I have five small children to support. I would be very thankful to you for your kindness."

The name and address were signed. The thought of the child's pinched, white face and hungry eyes would not leave me; so, though I could ill spare the time that day, I was soon on my way to see the woman. I had some difficulty in finding the place, but eventually I found it—an old, wooden tenement building in a back alley. Up three shakey flights of wooden stairs I went, and at a small landing found a little barefooted, ragged girl holding a half-dressed baby.

"Does Mrs. Peterson live here?" I asked.

And in response to her call, "Mother, here's a lady to see you!" a woman came to door.

She, too, was ragged, but she at least made an effort to be clean. She had a pleasant face, and she invited me in. I explained my errand—that I thought perhaps some of my little girl's outgrown clothing might do for her children.

She was at work preparing clothes for ironing. She explained that she did as much washing and ironing as she could, but the baby was "so cross" she could not work all the time.

Her husband, she said, had died four months ago, but for seven years before his death he was too sick to work, and she supported the family by going out washing and cleaning house. The baby is four months old, a little boy is four years old, and the little nurse-girl six years of age, though in size she looks at least two years younger than my little daughter of the same age. The faces of all the children were pinched and white, and each had an old, careworn expression.

Think of all three of these children being born after the father had become a hopeless invalid! What will become of these helpless little children? What opportunity have they in this poverty-stricken, and disease cursed life? And yet there are thousands—yes, millions—of innocent little ones suffering for even the barest necessities of existence, as they are suffering. Is not something wrong with the system which produces them?

I was telling a young girl friend of mine about the sad state in which I found Mrs. Peterson and her children. My little daughter was near us, and it seems that the point which impressed her was the fact that the husband was dead.

"But then," Virna exclaimed, "the woman could marry again!"

That, however, is exactly what a poverty-stricken, careworn mother of a large family of little children cannot do. Theoretically, it is always possible for a widow to marry, but practically it is not. So what can she do with her children? L. H.

An Announcement.

LUCIFER READERS: By invitation of the Working Men's Self-Educational Club of St. Louis, I have accepted a proposition to deliver a series of lectures on topics dealing with the work problem or subjects allied thereto, before various organizations in that city during the month of July, dates 2 to 16 inclusive.

It has therefore been proposed that the plan be extended to other cities and towns desiring to make arrangements for such a series. The time at my disposal for such a propaganda trip extends from June 18 to the middle of September. My first engagement is at Pittsburg on the 18th, and during the week following; the week of June 25 to July 2 is not yet arranged for, and I should be glad to hear from parties at intermediate points with reference to filling that week—from Cincinnati particularly. From points west of St. Louis I should be glad to hear with reference to dates during the months of July (latter half) and August. I have a letter from the Society of the Kansas Freethinkers' Association, saying I shall be wanted at the Convention August 29, 30 and 31. I would therefore like to hear from my old friends in Topeka if they are still there, with reference to the outlook in that place, and from any one in Denver who may be interested in arranging a few lectures there. I would prefer to speak in Chicago and northern points on my return east in accordance with the divine logic of railroad expenses.

It will no doubt be objected that I have chosen an inappropriate season for work of this sort. Were I pinning my faith to indoor meetings I should share that opinion; but the greatest lesson I learned during my English trip two years ago, was that it is the summer propaganda, the open-air propaganda, of which we stand most in need. It is the source whence so much new and young blood flows into the Scotch and English movements. It is true that in England they have the right of free assemblage which we do not; but meetings on the picnic order, such as the Farmers' Alliance used to hold some years ago, meetings in private parks, tent meetings, etc., these can be arranged where there is a disposition to do so. Some cities have the right of public meeting by permit on some public square; in regard to such I would say that while it is unlikely a permit would be given to an anarchistic topic I think it would be worth while trying whether they would refuse a permit to speak on the social teachings of Jesus, even of a Sunday. And if it is given, why, I promise to "Roar 'em gently as any nightingale."

As to the subject of lectures they will include discussions of the development of Impersonal Rule, in Economic relations, Marital, Social, Political and Moral; a consideration of the two constructive schools of Communism and Individualism, and some criticism thereon; the possibilities of the Trade Union; Strikes and the General Strike. But as to special titles, they can best be decided by correspondence.

Hoping that those who intend to write will do so at once, I am always Yours for liberty, VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

Thoughts from Marcus Aurelius.

Remember to put yourself in mind every morning that before night it will be your luck to meet with some busybody, with some ungrateful, abusive fellow, with some knavish, envious or unsociable churl or other. Now all this perverseness in them proceeds from their ignorance of good and evil; and since it has fallen to my share to understand the natural beauty of a good action and the deformity of an ill one . . . I am likewise convinced that no one can force me to misbehave myself, nor can I find it in my heart to hate or be angry with one of my own nature and family. . . .

If you will be governed by reason, and manage what lies before you with industry, vigor and temper; if you will not run after new distractions, but keep your divinity pure, even though you must at once render it up again, your mind stanch and well disciplined, as if this trial of behavior were your last; and if you will cleave to this and be true to the best of yourself, fearing and desiring nothing, but living up to your nature, standing boldly by the truth of your word, and satisfied therewith, then you will be a happy man. But the whole world cannot hinder you from doing so. . . If a man affronts you do not accept his opinion or think just as he would have you do. No, look upon things as reality presents them.

Be always provided with principles for these two purposes: First, to engage in nothing but what reason dictates, what the sovereign and legislative part of you shall suggest, for the interest of mankind. Secondly, to be disposed to quit your opinion and alter your measures when a friend shall give you good grounds for so doing. . .

The Final Test.

From "Free Love," by Austin Kent.

We and our opponents [Adin Ballou, H. C. Wright and Andrew Jackson Davis] alike contend for the absolute freedom of woman. This is well. Then it is right that she should be "allowed to choose the father of her children." We here tell our opponents if she, in freedom, shall continue to do this, in strict harmony with their dual doctrines, we shall never reproach or condemn her for it. Are they ready to meet us here, if in such freedom, she shall, to any extent, act in harmony with our views? We have a right, and do demand as much as this of them. We ask Mr. Wright in the name of every principle of justice and consistency, after having so nobly defended the rights of woman, to take off and keep off his hands from all women, and from man also. I honor the man or woman who, from an honest faith or belief, lives to his or her dual pledge. I have no heart in me to reproach or slander such. We ask, and demand of our opponents, who talk freedom, to feel and act freedom—allow freedom.

If we fail to make them understand our mental philosophy, we will then meet and appeal to them to let woman be free; and we covenant with them to keep hands off—judgments and reproaches off—and we will abide by her practical decision. We can join issue here, if they and we really mean the freedom of woman. This is a good and fair test. We shall write our book as they have theirs, and then wait with entire trust to the developments of the future. Woman will have her freedom. Truth will grow and prosper, and that shall be our final arbiter.

From Their Point of View.

Let any man once show the world that he feels
Afraid of its bark, and 'twill fly at his heels;
Let him fearlessly face it, 'twill leave him alone;
But 'twill fawn at his feet if he flings it a bone.
—Owen Meredith.

Once upon a time an American taunted an Englishman. "How can you endure to be taxed to support your idle nobility?" exclaimed the American warmly. This fable teaches that there are almost as many ways of paying taxes as of dodging the same.—Detroit "Journal."

Legislation against trusts should be general and grows dangerous as soon as it becomes special. The best of all legislation on this line will be found in the end in acts repealing laws now in existence, out of which the trusts have grown and without which they cannot thrive or live. To cure the trust, remove the cause. It is more freedom, and not more restraint, which the people need in order to enable them to defend and sustain themselves.—Dallas "News."

Land where the apes reside
On every mountain side,
To thee I sing.

We'll guard thy rocks and rills;

VARIOUS VOICES.

H. L., Dallas, Tex.—I am getting more and more interested in Lucifer's doctrines and don't wish to miss a copy. I enjoyed reading your father's last letter to Lucifer from Southern Mississipi. I was born just over the line from he where he wrote—in Southern Alabama, in 1857. I am much pleased with the use you made of the Dallas "News" extract that I sent you. Brains and logic are on your side. Yours for the truth if it "takes the hide off."

Georgina R. Sheldon, Newspaper Dept. Historical Society, Madison, Wis.—We have received through the courtesy of Dr. Taylor of the Chicago "Commons," a somewhat incomplete file of Lucifer, commencing March, 1898. We have a large and very important collection of labor and socialistic papers commenced by Dr. Ely, to which we are making constant additions. We should esteem it a great favor if you could fill in the missing numbers in the file of Lucifer, that we might have it bound. I enclose a list of our wants. Should you see fit to place this library on your free mailing list it would be greatly appreciated.

Mrs. Marion Carter, Lockport, N. Y.—I enclose two dollars. Please send me "Cuba's Fight for Freedom and the War with Spain," $1.50; also Lucifer one year. This is a very liberal offer and I wish to avail myself of it. Also send "Orthodoxy False since Spiritualism is True," "What is Right" and "Man's True Saviors." I enclose a notice of Mr. Carter's funeral. He died March 13 of heart failure. He had taken Lucifer for a number of years; had a photo of your little daughter, and many of Lucifer's books. He admired your father very much, and thought he was doing a good work with his daughter's help. You certainly have done well during your father's absence. May he be spared many years to you and to this world.

S. O. Bishop, Hammond, La.—I am sorry that all the readers of Lucifer, yes the whole world too, have not been able to see and receive the light from our much-martyred Moses Harman. We think we had the rarest treat of our lives, and if we had been in better shape to have entertained him here at the Hewett Brothers' nursery, it would have been more to our liking, but as it was, we were the benefited instead of the invalid. He gave a parlor talk on Sunday afternoon to a very small, but a very appreciative audience. There were two reasons for its being small—first the invitations were given personally, and therefore necessarily limited—second it threatened rain, and did rain in the evening.

His talk was on the line of "Motherhood in Freedom." Though I, from deafness, could not hear all, yet enough was understood to make it much more impressive than to read it in a book. This is an age of reason, we hear, and if that be true, why continue the fast declining race by impulse instead of by reason? Hang law and Mother Grundy "on a sour apple tree," and give mothers freedom and they will be more inclined to teach their children the most important lesson of their being, than to trust them to learn it from the slum of the street. My dwarfish brain and body, perhaps, is not all due to the lesson I was compelled to learn in the street, but to the lessons that my ancestors away back ever since the age of priestcraft have been compelled to learn in the same degraded manner.

Songs of the Unblind Cupid.

Under the title "Songs of the Unblind Cupid," an edition de luxe, in red and black, of a few hitherto unpublished poems by the liberal poet, J. Wm. Lloyd, is just issued.

The verses are printed from Kelmscott type upon deckle edged, hand-made paper of cerulean tint. Covers brown, with choice of silver or gold lettering. Initial letters, ornaments and borders are in red, and an initial letter and sketch upon the opening page are hand painted in water colors.

Mr. Lloyd, as author of "Wired Harp Songs" and the "Red Heart in a White World," needs no introduction to the liberal public. These few new poems of love, liberty and nature are here preserved in the highest style of the printers' art, and should find a place in the collection of every friend of freedom, every lover of poetry and every admirer of choice and dainty publications.

Edition limited to 600 copies. There will be no second edition.

Price per copy, 30 cents, sent postpaid upon receipt of price by M. Harman, 502 Carroll Avenue, Chicago.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

The following by WILLIAM DENTON, pioneer Freethought and Spiritualist lecturer, and naturalist, who died while on a journey of scientific research in the wilds of Australia some fifteen years ago, are of as vital importance now as when they were written:

Sermons from Shakespeare's Text:
"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything."
Orthodoxy False, Since Spiritualism is True.
The God Proposed for Our National Constitution.
What is Right?
Man's True Saviors.
Christianity No Finality or Spiritualism Superior to Christianity.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

Contains matter pertaining to the Legitimation League and the Persons Rights Association of England. Also, four fine full page portraits of Ezra H. Heywood, Moses Harman, Lillian Harman and Lois Waisbrooker, together with sketches of their personalities and work. By Oswald Dawson. Neatly bound boards. Price, 20 cents. WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried handbook, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 20 cents per dozen.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalisation of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Some Problems in Social Freedom. Presidential address delivered by Lillian Harman before the Legitimation League, at Hotborn Restaurant, London. LUCIFER.

THE LIGHT-BEARER.

THIRD SERIES, VOL. III., No. 21. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, JUNE 3, E. M. 299. [C. E. 1899.] WHOLE No. 764.

God Save the Queen!

(On her eighteenth birthday, May 24, 1899.)

God save the Queen!
Poor Queen, for so many dismal years pinioned at the very focus of the great Lie!
They speak of the light which beats against the throne, but if the light be darkness, how great is that darkness!
The darkness of murderous wars, blacker than smoking cannon and bomb-shell;
The darkness of dim-windowed prison cells;
The darkness of slum and cellar, of coal-mine and sooty foundry;
The darkness of clouded minds, of sombre lives, of dullness, despair and sin and death;
The subtle, more hideous darkness of false wealth and power and grandeur, lurid with greed and self-will and contemptuous pride;
The darkness of social superstition and make-believe, of ignorance and injustice:
Poor Queen! these are the shades that have long lain at their thickest upon you—upon you who may soon have to pass on into the light of truth.
May your eyes be strong for the shock of trial after all these scoured years.
God save the Queen! (For who so much needs saving?)
God save the Queen!

The Race Question.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

The newspapers report that recently a mob went to the jail in Lebanon, Tenn., to lynch Ewing Hodge, a negro, who was charged with "attempted murder." They did not find him; but not to be cheated of a victim, they took Bill Dibble, another negro, who was charged with "attempted theft." Was the action of this mob a defense of the "honor of southern womanhood?"

To be a negro and to be charged with a crime is proof that the accused is guilty, it seems; and no conceivable punishment is too severe for the "superior race" to inflict on the ignorant and helpless offender. Every case of fiendish torturing is excused and justified—yes, even glorified—because it is held to be in defense of womanhood. In many cases, however, men have been hanged and even burned by mobs when there was not even that excuse for the action.

For instance, in Knoxville, Ark., June 10, '98, James Perry was shut up in his cabin and burned to death because he had small-pox. How would the white sufferers from small-pox like to have that remedy applied to their cases? Would it be easy to convince them that such treatment was necessary to the preservation of the "honor" of northern womanhood? Then there is the case of the infant child of Postmaster Baker, of Lake City, S. C., who, with its father was burned to death.

Is there any womanhood on the face of the earth which requires the burning flesh of living babes as sacrifice to its "honor?" Yet it is claimed that those who protest against the cruelty of the punishment thereby defend or condone the crime which the mob avenges.

"Bill Arp" is writing letters in attempted justification of the mobs, and he says the brutes who outrage little children "find friends among our enemies." Nothing could be more absurd than such a statement. If a mad dog mangles and kills a little child we can not blame the father or any other man who would kill the dog at once with any weapon which lay at hand. And I believe that any man who will kill a child is as dangerous as a mad dog. But if, instead of killing the dog which had torn the child the men should take the dog and tie it to a stake and slowly roast it, while with knives they dismembered it, living, preserving portions of its body as ghastly souvenirs, what would be thought of the perpetrators of that deed? And if, in addition to all this, they actually advertised the burning in advance and run excursion trains to the scene of the burning—as they did in Paris, Texas—what then? Would not the parties to this action thereby prove themselves on a level with the lowest savages who take delight in burning and otherwise torturing their enemies?

In writing of the Sam Hose burning "Bill Arp" says, "I rejoiced when the brute was caught and burned. How much he suffered is of no consequence to me.....and I am not chicken-hearted about such suspects as Lige Strickland,"—a man who was merely suspected of complicity in the crime, implicated by Hose when under torture. Strickland was burned and mutilated on no evidence but this. And Arp warns the other negroes of their fate should they protest—"Nor would I take very much sympathetic talk from other negro leaders who raise their bristles."

And again: "Sooner or later we will have to take away his vote and establish the whipping post, and then, and not till then, will we have peace between the races."

But will the result be peace? The fathers of those mobmaniacs sowed the wind, and their descendants are reaping the whirlwind. Now these descendants are again sowing the whirlwind and what will their descendants reap? Is it strange that the children of outrage should themselves be guilty of outrage?

"Arp" says that his servant, "Uncle Sam," says that he was born a slave, and he has found that "if a colored man done his duty the white man done his." "Uncle Sam has a large family and through these Republican influences they have been corrupted and demoralized, and he has lot of grandchildren who don't know their own father and the old man is grieved."

Ah! But does the "old man" know his own father, I wonder? And does he know his grandfather? If he is a full-blooded negro he is indeed a rare specimen among the negroes of this country; and if he has the blood of the white race flowing in his veins, where did he get it? In "honorable" marriage between black and white ancestors?

I do not believe there can be found a single case of an outrage perpetrated by a full-blooded negro, in all those which have been so bitterly avenged. And the question arises, Did these men inherit nothing from their white ancestors? Undoubtedly many of the black women who were the mothers of yellow babies were willing to accept their white masters in the relation which produced those babies; but it is also true that in innumerable instances the white man did his wooing with the lash, and there have been instances where black women have been outraged as cruelly as was the victim of Sam Hose. Is it strange that the product of such horrible unions should inherit a desire for outrage from the white father, and the thirst for revenge of its black or yellow mother? Is the white blood not to be taken into account at all, but only the blood, the instincts, which the poor victim of the slave system has inherited from his African ancestors be held responsible for all his acts?

Is it possible that the thousands of white men who compose these mobs can look on the faces of their victims and not ask themselves, "Is it not possible that this is my brother, or my cousin? If not mine he is the brother of some white man, and WHY is he what he is and where he is?"

If every white man who had ever outraged a black woman had met the fate of Sam Hose, many of the men who burn negroes would not be alive today—many of them would never have been born.

It is hard to forgive those whom we have injured, is an old axiom. Is it not time that the white race should forgive its yellow half-brother for having injured him? Is it not time to stop breeding hate and revenge? If we are the superior race, should we not prove it in our actions?

Defend the "honor of southern womanhood"—yes, and of northern womanhood, too, and above all, defend the rights of the black or yellow woman as vigilantly as you defend the rights of her white sister. And if a man, be he black or yellow or white, invades the person of any woman, be her color what it may, then take such measures as may be necessary to restrain him from such invasion; but let such restraint be "more in sorrow than in anger."

We are the victims of the passions of our ancestors. Let us not intensify their evil in transmitting them to our children.

The Question of Woman's Dress.

MY DEAR HELEN: I have very little hope that dress reform will make much progress in this day and generation. A few women, here and there, have lightened the burden of their clothes appreciably, and a few girls, here and there, will refuse to take up the burden of dragging skirts; but you and I are not going to live to see women wearing any form of dress which permits them to move, which sets them free to move. There never was a steady advance, all along the line, in any onward step. Probably there can't be, in the nature of things. And in this there surely will not be—or I am no prophetess. You know I am never very sanguine, and this calls for more hopefulness than ever falls to my lot to feel on the brightest day.

I know plenty of girls who put on their gymnasium suits and have a splendid time for an hour, and are perfectly, distinctly conscious that they are having a splendid time. They go to the dressing room and say:

"If we didn't have to put on skirts to go home—it spoils it all!"

But, comparing notes while the skirts are being put on, their new bicycle suits are all two inches longer than they were last year.

"I got mine ready-made, and the girl told me that was what they were all wearing this year."

Now it is not enough that there is some inward chafing against the perennial edict: "That's what they're wearing this year." Discontent is not revolution—nor very much of evolution. Some strength it takes to grumble, and just about so much of it gets done before anything else gets done. But "the good time coming" is a long way off. I hardly know a dozen women who, outside the gymnasium, have the real courage of their own pleasure in free movement. And I think that is the very first essential. There is, as yet, the faintest consciousness among women of what life can offer, apart from being personally admired.

So far as any progress has been made toward a better dress, the wheel has been the motor. Somehow, some women discovered that there was exhilaration in it, a touch of life that was not a creeping and hitching and dragging a weary load. When this grew into an open secret, the rest followed. It is a continual marvel that so many poor people can have a wheel, and a pretty constant illustration of the ability in people to afford what they want sufficiently. A wheel seems capable of extracting money from the poorest pocket. And, in like manner, a wheel can extract one concession from the women who live most in their clothes; a woman's bicycle costume weighs less than her street costume. But there, as yet, it ends.

To deliver one's self up to burning indignation sometimes is a salutary process. Don't deny me the relief of storming away about it all. I know the other side and see it with perfect clearness. But I am justified in being righteously cross when I see, as I often do, girls and women wearing heavy skirts when they could help it, when, at that time, no possible harm or trouble could come to them in consequence, when no human eye—except mine—is upon them to know if their dress be long or short.

The sex element in dress is very little understood. Mrs. Stetson touches upon it, and my impression is that she testifies her recognition of the dominant part it plays. But, in general, there is very little apprehension of its significance. That everything about a woman's dress is designed to appeal directly and sharply to the sex desire in man, is a fact that is perpetually lost sight of. What women feel is that men admire a fashionably dressed woman. Fashions may change within certain limits, but the sexual limitations of dress are always preserved. And men may write volumes on the urgent need of dress reform for women, and one word of quick admiration for an ultra-fashionably dressed woman will more than balance—just as man may write volumes against the church and deny it all with one bend of the knee before the altar.

Admiration follows the line of the least resistance. And love sometimes follows admiration. A woman needs love, and the sequence is ended. A man's ability to make his own terms depends very much on his lesser need of love. The whole sex feels this—that man's expression about women when he is "off duty," his chance word called out by chance, holds his real feeling. If he says that the girls in St. Louis are "better groomed" than the girls in Chicago, or that a man likes a woman who has some style about her, the general tenor of his reflections upon the sex is fairly well settled. Every woman, when considering even the slightest deviation from the fashionable in dress must face the question: how much more important or pleasant to me is the ready admiration of men than freedom of motion in a healthful, unhampered body?

Have I ever told you the story of Mary Graves? She is lame, so lame that she uses her cane at every step. I suggested that a short dress would be much better for her. She discussed it with her lover. He had often thought of the danger for her in going over the stairs in a skirt of the usual length; and he really approved of a better and safer style of dress for all women. So he advised her to have a short suit and to wear it constantly. I called on her one day. The dress was quite ideal.

"How does Mr. Howe like it?" I asked.

"He says he likes it," Mary answered.

And then an honest flash came into her brown eyes and she said:

"Men may say what they like about dress reform for women. I think they all like it better when some other fellow's girl wears it."

It does not sound very encouraging, do you think?

But, as the old country doctor was always saying, "It'll all come right in time, all come right in time." The simple, strong desire to have a good time, to breathe, to live,—though neither men nor women, nor gods, are following us with admiring eyes, will sometime take possession of women and then the battle is won. And everything will follow—even, some day, admiration.

You have seen these lines? They come often to my mind:

"What woman should be? Sir, consult the taste
Of marriagable men. This planet's store
In iron, cotton, wool or chemicals—
All matter rendered to our plastic skill,
Is wrought in shapes responsive to demand:
The market's pulse makes index high and low,
By rule sublime. Our daughters must be wives,
And to be wives must be what men will choose:
Men's taste is woman's test. You mark the phrase?
'Tis good, I think?—the sense well winged and poised
With i's and a's."

The Passing of Tradition.

New York "World."

The most interesting dramatic topic of the day in New York is the instant and brilliant success of a young actress who has defied tradition and given to the stage a new Juliet.

The man whose name is uppermost in church discussions at the moment is a preacher who has expressed his disbelief in certain portions of a religious creed which has descended through the generations.

The most-talked-of business man of the day is an American millionaire who, departing from the traditional custom of his kind, retires from commercial pursuits while still in his capable years to spend his own money for the public good.

From these conspicuous personal cases, and from a great number of modern acts and occurrences is to be read the lesson of the increasing weakness of tradition as a force to hold the universe.

In politics, religion, business, society—everywhere the disposition to hold to the old because it is old is growing less and less. Veneration remains, but it no longer means imitation and stagnation.

Just as surely as the earth whirls around the sun, the world's population moves to the great light of progress. Tradition may furnish useful precedents, but no more do we walk tightly bound in its leading strings of thought and custom.

Conservative Willie Winters may moan at a new reading of Shakespeare; book-bound medicos have spasms over an advanced treatment for diphtheria; musicians of century-old attunements scoff at the idea of modern developments in composition and performance.

But over and beyond the firmly rooted conservatives in all professions and pursuits marches the army of those who, proving all things, find much that can be bettered.

It is not the thing for a son to be a Democrat or Republican because his father was one before. He thinks for himself and he develops his business for himself and he goes generally on the principle that because he is living today, he must do as today demands. That's the way he gets on. It's the way any of us get on.

Pneumonia patients were once carefully kept from all suggestions of frigidity. Today they are treated with ice-water applications. So ancient prejudices and mind-disabling fixtures of practice and belief are remedied by applying the frozen facts of modern discovery.

Naturally enough, tradition is at its strongest in the church. It has not been all-powerful even there. Men do break away from creeds and from strict interpretations of Bible passages, and they have followers into new realms of theological thought. But for the mass of men and women there is a sacredness to affairs of worship and a mystery concerning life here and beyond which keep the congregations well within the bounds of belief if not of dogma.

The goal of all progress is somewhere, and those who come long after on earth will perhaps reach it. We shall not find ourselves even within sight of it.

But it is a certain thing, that unless human energy and human thought shall be paralyzed at a blow things will go right on changing and tradition will continue to lose its grip as the years go by.

Conservative critics can't stop the motion. Not for the church, the stage, the battle-field, the ballot-place, the market or the home shall ever come a tomorrow which is precisely as today.

From Their Point of View.

Liberty and love go together. The more you give of each, the more you possess.—"Light of Truth."

The clergyman published the banns of marriage, and then the clerk gave out the hymn, "Mistaken souls, who dream of heaven."—Sel.

It seems a mere bagatelle for Uncle Sam to put down the Philippine insurrection. If he wants to fight something nearer his size, why doesn't he tackle the Standard Oil Company?—St. Louis "Republican."

A college professor in Buffalo has published a book in which he says: "Any nation that works its women is damned, and belongs in heart to the Huron-Iroquois confederacy." That learned pundit seems to be unaware of the fact that women in the household work pretty hard.—Springfield "Republican."

A Rhode Island woman has built a "spite fence" twenty feet high. A close inspection of the structure would no doubt reveal the fact that she had one board inserted which contained a knot hole through which she could peep when the distasteful neighbor's washing was hung out.—Denver "News."

In one of Lincoln's early speeches against slavery he said, answering Stephen A. Douglas: "My distinguished friend says it is an insult to the emigrants to Kansas and Nebraska to suppose they are not able to govern themselves. We must not slur over an argument of this kind because it happens to tickle the ear. It must be met and answered. I admit that the emigrant to Kansas is competent to govern himself but (the speaker rising to his full height) I deny his right to govern any other person without that person's consent." And there are people in this country who dare compare McKinley to Lincoln.—Jerry Simpson's "Bayonet."

The Right Rev. William Croswell Doane, bishop of Albany, has found time to form an opinion of the marriage of the divorced Mrs. Sloane to Mr. Perry Belmont, and does not hesitate to express it. He avers that "affair" was "in utter violation of the laws of God and man—horrid, simply horrid—horrid." [Some] Christians seem to be unable to eliminate from their system that phallic element which causes excitement and sets their scandal-loving tongues a-running whenever any aspect of the marriage relation is presented that affords opportunity for comment. The remarriage of Mrs. Sloane on the day her divorce was granted, though she had long been separated from Mr. Sloane, has proved a greater shock to the pulpit than the exposed adulteries of several hundred preachers—probably for the reason that the latter offense has become too frequent to attract attention.—"Truth Seeker."

A Straw.

"A Chicago preacher, Rev. W. H. Wise, who recently visited London, has this to say in regard to the workings of the City Council of West Ham: 'It puts new faith and hope into one, and forever silences the cry that "Socialism is utopian," to sit in a council having jurisdiction over 300,000 people that is overwhelmingly Socialistic, and to hear measures discussed and passed by a large majority that in our country would seem impractical and even revolutionary.' He also declares that the old forms of religion have lost their power."

The above is from a clipping sent to me—paper not named. By the way, it was this Council of West Ham, I believe, that recently ruled the "Freethinker" and other freethought literature out of the Library. Thus do we see the "old forms of religion" losing power.

Notes by the Way.

ROODHOUSE, ILL., May 28, '99.

Leaving Thayer, Miss., May 23, I came by way of the Illinois Central railroad to Crystal Springs, thirty miles north of Thayer, and remained twenty-four hours at this much celebrated shipping point for fruits and vegetables to northern markets. It is claimed that more "truck" is shipped from this place than from any other single producing point in the United States or in the world. Later on I hope to give our readers a carefully prepared statement of what I saw and learned of the advantages offered by this section of the United States to the landless homeseeker.

From Crystal Springs I came direct to St. Louis, where I spent two days and nights visiting old friends and making the acquaintance of some new ones. Friday night a parlor meeting was held at the home of the LeLievers, mother and son, on Chestnut street, which proved a very enjoyable, and it is hoped a not unprofitable affair, the chief cause of regret being the fact that the shortness of my stay prevented adequate and timely notice being given to friends in distant parts of the city. In compliance with the unanimous request of those present I gave some account of my trip and the result of my observations and experiences in the "Sunny South," for the past four months or thereabouts. The economic and social questions, including the race problem, came in for a share of discussion, and so deeply interested were all present in these old, yet ever new themes that it was near midnight before the meeting broke up.

During my brief stay in the "Mound City," as it is sometimes called, I was the guest of Drs. Hatton & Slater, of the Osteopathic Institute, Odd Fellows Building, and of our old and yet young friends, the Fritons, of the firm of "Friton Brothers," jewellers and engravers, whose business rooms are on Pine street, near Sixth. Their home is on Shenandoah Ave. and Nebraska street, one of the most beautiful and healthful portions of the city. My morning walks in the beautifully adorned "Heights" near by, were keenly enjoyed, the weather being absolutely perfect, and the recent showers and May sunshine having clothed the trees, shrubs and lawns in their richest verdure.

From St. Louis I came by way of the Chicago and Alton railroad to Roodhouse, passing through the historic city of Alton, "throned on its hills," a city made famous, or rather infamous for all time by the killing of Elijah Lovejoy and the repeated destruction of his press by a proslavery mob.

The country along this line of road seems very fertile and productive—the farms very highly improved, showing industry, thrift and taste on the part of their owners. The contrast between the appearance of Southern Illinois and that of Southern Mississippi is indeed very great, the one being almost one continuous cultivated farm, while the other is, in many parts, nearly unbroken wilderness. Another cause of contrast, favorable to Illinois, is the fact that while the latter has been blessed with abundant rains, Southern Mississippi has had no rain to speak of for some two months unless it has fallen within a few days last past.

These lines have been written while waiting in the "Hotel Roodhouse" for a team to carry me to the home of our friends, the Campbells, living some three miles from town, and as said team may come any moment I will bring this letter to a close and forward it to the office at once, lest it be too late to appear in No. 764.

Before closing, I wish to call attention to a few typographic mistakes or omissions in my article entitled "The Social Conscience," etc.—published in last issue. The most important of these errors is found near the bottom of the second column of said article, in the paragraph beginning, "Marriage means monopoly." A whole line seems to have been left out of the first sentence of that paragraph, rendering the sense very incomplete, not to say very obscure. The meaning intended to be conveyed is that "marriage monopoly," the canon law marriage trust, as now controlled by priest and judge, must be broken, must be abolished through the agency of an educated or reformed "social conscience," before we can rationally expect economic reform or any other real reform in associative human life. In the paragraph preceding the one just referred to, the word "approximately" should be "appropriately." The word occurs in the third line. In the seventh line of the second paragraph, page 157, first column, the word "constructed" should be "reconstructed." A number of minor mistakes, such as "woman" for "women," and vice versa, errors of punctuation, etc., occur, but it is hoped that all of these will not prevent the main drift of the article being understood. The fact that Lillian has had a sick child to care for, in addition to her other onerous duties, excuses her for the failures in proof-reading, in this and recent issues of the Light Bearer.

M. HARMAN.

Proudhon's Masterpiece.

What is Property? Or an inquiry into the Principle of Right and of Government. By P. J. Proudhon. Prefaced by a sketch of Proudhon's life and works. Translated from the French by Benj. R. Tucker. A systematic, thorough and radical discussion of the institution of property—its basis, its history, its present status and its destiny—together with a detailed and startling expose of the crimes which it commits and the evils which it engenders. 500 pages. Original price, $3.50. Our special price, $1.25.

Special Notice.

By an oversight, the price of Austin Kent's pamphlet on "Free Love," is given as 15 cents in the last two issues of Lucifer. The pamphlet was published originally to sell at 80 cents. That was nearly a quarter of a century ago, and it is now out of print with the exception of 200 copies which have been donated to Lucifer by Delos Dunton, a cousin of the author. Although it is a classic in the literature of liberty it may not be republished for many years—perhaps not for a century, when some person may discover its value and send it broadcast throughout the world—and the present opportunity to secure it should not be neglected by those who desire a clear and strong statement of the case in favor of freedom in connubial love.

The pamphlet contains 140 pages in paper cover. The full inscription on the title page is "Free Love, or a Philosophical Demonstration of the Non-Exclusive Nature of Connubial Love; also a Review of the Exclusive Feature of the Fowlers, Adin Ballou, H. C. Wright and Andrew Jackson Davis on Marriage. By Austin Kent. Second edition. Stockholm, N. Y. Published by the author. 1875."

Owing to the scarcity of this book, its intrinsic value and the probability that it will not be republished, we feel that it is not asking too much to place the price at 50 cents, which is less than the original price of the book. However, not to take undue advantage of Lucifer's readers who have read the previous advertisements in which the price was given at 15 cents by an oversight, the book will be sent for that price (15 cents) until June 10. This will give readers about one week to take advantage of the special reduced price. After June 10 the pamphlet will not be sold for less than 50 cents.

Besides the pamphlet on "Free Love," we have the following tracts or leaflets by Austin Kent, which we will send postpaid at the prices quoted:

"Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull and Her 'Social Freedom,'" including an appendix on Woodhull and Beecher, letters of Parker Pillsbury endorsing Mrs. Woodhull, an essay "What is Spiritualism?" by Mrs. Woodhull, and "An English View of Mrs. Woodhull and Her Work," by Robert J. Kendall. Only twelve copies remain—15 cents.

"My Creed or What I Believe and What I Know"—2 cents.

"To My Atheistical Brothers, or How I Became Assured of the Existence of the Unseen Intelligence."—2 cents.

"An Open Letter to Andrew Jackson Davis, or What I Call Conjugal Love."—5 cents.

"Conjugal Love—The True and the False."—5 cents.

These leaflets are small, but their value should be judged by the quality of the matter and not by the number of words they contain.

Varied Opinions.

M. FLORENCE JOHNSON, Dear Madam: . . . You jump at conclusions. Now a conclusion is something a woman arrives at without thought or reason. We all meet with surprises; some are pleasant, others are not; I haven't met with any but the pleasant as far as our correspondence is concerned. As to the word "sacred," I never use it in connection with Gods, Pagan or Christian.

I know there is such a word, and I think I know how to apply it. To you the right to life, peace, comfort and happiness is "sacred," and I am sure that the one who endeavors to deprive you of these rights would get just such a curse as the fig tree got—one that would wither it to the very roots, or else you are composed of a different metal than I imagine.

Man in his relation to the natural world is subject to two conditions—the natural and the unnatural. The natural is nature's own handiwork; the unnatural is man's. When we conform to nature's requirements all is well, when we fail to do this penalties follow that makes us aware of the fact that there is more than one god in Israel.

"Love;" I detest the word. I wish it could be obliterated from our vocabulary. It is always found at one extreme, while hate and wrath is pulling at the other. We should avoid extremes. God so loved the world that he gave his only illegitimate son to be cruelly massacred in order to remedy the defects of his own plans. The Lord chastiseth them that he loves. The stuff called love is founded on amativeness. It gets hot quick, and cools off quicker. You see this in the lower animals, and you see it among God's images. The great and grand quality of reason is absent in both tribes. What I want is that deep, heart-felt affection shown to all in a manner that will prevent any one from injuring another in any form or manner. To call such a condition love is nonsense. It is hard to break the customs that have been centuries in forming. It is hard to break loose from the usages of a high civilization. Nothing but death can or should disrupt family relations. The family is a "sacred" institution, and cursed be he who dares to invade its "sacred" precincts. Marriage is simply a civil contract and is as necessary as life itself. I care nothing for the silly mummery of priestcraft about what "God hath joined together," for if God does really do the work he does a lot that he must surely be ashamed of. That man does really put asunder is strongly in evidence.

You say that your phase of free thought is the "right to think." Why, my dear woman, there is no power but death that can deprive you of that right. It is only when you clothe your thoughts with words and acts that results appear. If these results are beneficial to our race you will receive commendation, if injurious you will "hear something drop." The world is filled with evil, and the one who tries to atone for it all by committing suicide is hopelessly insane. We cannot break the whole bundle of fagots across our knee, but we can take one at a time and do the work easily.

If I had the power to destroy imaginary demons, the first that would fall before my withering glance would be that little nasty, naked imp called Cupid. I would trample down "love's flowery bowers," and prove to the world that the scent of its bruised posies was beyond the power of a polecat to equal. The lower animals, like the ancient Hebrews, are guided by instinct, and that instinct runs mainly in the direction of reproduction. This instinct is a natural quality, and is necessary in order to replenish the earth. Among the lower animals (including the Hebrews) this power of reproduction is not guided by reason or common sense, it runs wild and dire results follow. I can't imagine what would be the results if the so-called free love party held the balance of power, or the whole of it. If a man under the influence of free love should come monkeying around my wife I would surely become a murderer.

I may not be able to comprehend the subject in its highest light, and I trust that you will not look upon my apparent levity as any disrespect on my part, far from it. I propose to show proper respect to all. You have a sacred right to your opinions and I respect those rights. I like your letters; they are highly entertaining and instructive. Your last letter arrived while I was on a bed suffering extreme pain, but I read it with pleasure.

Lucifer came to hand, but through some mishap it was lost before I had read it all. The couple that had the "love baby" struck my notice, but will make no comments. I would be pleased to hear from you again. Yours for progress,

WALTER BARTON.

WALTER BARTON, My Dear Sir: .....You say that I "jump at conclusions;" but you do not point out the conclusions jumped at. In your previous letter you say, "Women comprise the best half of the intelligence of the race," then express surprise at receiving a sensible letter from a woman. In this letter you say, "Now a conclusion is something that a woman arrives at without thought or reason."

These remarks show that you have two standards—one for men, and another for women. Part of the time a deference for women is expressed, and part of the time condescension. Whether you are sincere in calling women the most intellectual half, or in the statement that they lack reason, I do not know. It can make no difference in my writing to you, for I do not acknowledge any difference in brain power because of sex. I have corresponded with many men and women, and no woman could jump at conclusions" more hysterically than do some men, and no man could reason more logically than do some women, and the statement would be as true if reversed. I desire to have what I write considered as a thought, not as a woman's thought, nor a man's thought. If the fact that I am a woman makes my thought either more or less valuable I will give your letters to some man to answer, that the sex of the writer may elevate or lower the thoughts to your level. There are both men and women who are superior, and other men and women who are inferior to me in intellect. So if you will, when writing to me, say "You jump at conclusions," or "You" do this and that, it will simplify matters wonderfully. Certainly I shall not hold all mankind responsible for any deficiency I may think I find in you, nor give the entire male half of the species credit for the good you may manifest. . .

"Sacred" implies sacrifice, and refers to religion. . . Life is dear to me; I appreciate it; I value it; but it is not "sacred" in the true sense of that word. I will defend myself from invasion, but not with curses. The idea that a man could say a few words to a tree and kill it because it did not bear fruit out of season, is a good illustration of cursing. . . I neither curse nor reverence anything. If I wanted a tree out of my way I would cut it down and destroy it. If weeds choked my flowers I would uproot them; but no one seeing me pulling weeds would go away and seriously say,

"I saw Mrs. Johnson out in her garden cursing weeds, this morning."

If he should say so, the hearer would not understand that I had been quietly pulling weeds, but would suppose I was angry and had manifested temper inconsistent with true womanly dignity. You will find more respect paid to rational condemnation than to "cursing." . .

You seem to believe in propagating the race; but not in love. . . But it seems to me that to discuss love with you would be like discussing beautiful paintings with one who is color blind. Such a person might think that all pictures should be destroyed, as they are a waste of time. Or such discussion would be like discussing music with a man who cannot distinguish different tones, and who thinks a musical chord only a combination of noises which should be stopped to free us from the confusion.

There are doubtless persons in this train who see nothing beautiful in the scenery through which we are passing, while to me it is so beautiful that only occasionally is it monotonous enough for a few minutes to allow me to write. I know one man who cannot appreciate a beautiful landscape. He had been at Harper's Ferry.

"You can't see much there because of the hills covered with trees," he said. "The river was so full of rocks that it was comparatively useless, and it would be very hard to make a living on such land!"

Beauty, to that man, was only found in rich, level land that would "raise a crop." . . .

Another man would not allow a piano played while he was in the house. His wife loved music, but that mattered not to him. When he entered the parlor, if there was music his first remark was, "Stop that damned noise!" He said the professed love for music was not genuine; his ears were as good as anybody's—"this noise is enough to drive one to distraction, and people only pretend to like it to assume some superiority."

This man was a physician, and quite intelligent in nearly every way; but had he been judged on all matters by his knowledge of time, tune and rhythm, he would have been considered an idiot.

Persons who are deficient in such a way are deprived of much enjoyment; but the one who through false education and lack of elevating experience has become deaf and blind, or unconscious of the joy and benefit of love, is more to be pitied than the color blind or the tone deaf. Especially is this an unfortunate condition if the person so disgusted by unhappy experience thinks it a duty to perpetuate the race and endow children with his unfortunate condition of mind and emotion. That is as unwise as for consumptives and epileptics to marry.

I wonder if your personal experience has caused you to assert that "The stuff called love is founded on amativeness. It gets hot quick and cools off quicker." My experience and observation have been quite different, and so the resulting opinion is also different . . . It has been so long since I have corresponded with a conservative—a moralist—that your expression, "The stuff called love," etc., and "it gets hot quick," etc., seem quite repulsive, and sound vulgar. The students of this question, the social radicals, do not speak in that way; but being free men and free women and expressing only what to them is beautiful and good, would lead away from that mode of life and its vocabulary. . . .

Now here are a few quotations from your letter which you may harmonize at your leisure. I confess my inability to do so:

"Nothing but death can or should disrupt the family relations. The family is a sacred institution, and cursed be he who dares to invade its sacred precincts."

"Marriage is simply a civil contract . . . is as necessary as life itself."

"If God does the work he does a lot that he must surely be ashamed of."

The common family relation is established by marriage. You say "marriage is simply a civil contract as necessary as life itself." Is civil contract sacred and necessary? If two persons run a grocery together would it be "sacred" if they had made a legal partnership, and should nothing but death separate them? Would they be unworthy of all respect if they dissolve the partnership?

If marriage is sometimes such that you as a man think God as a matchmaker ought to be ashamed of his work, what is the virtue in its being perpetuated until death? Under what order of thinking do you arrive at the conclusion that it is wise for an unhappy family to continue together—with all that such continuation implies? The assertions that the family is such that you are ashamed of it, and that it should never be broken up by anything but death, can only be reconciled by the "sacredness" of superstition. Why, many who still cling to old dogmas and creeds believe in divorce . . . That you cannot imagine what would be the result of free love is not surprising. A person who does not know the meaning of either freedom or love, would be under great difficulty in trying to imagine such a condition. You express contempt for the "stuff" you call love, and you as clearly express your belief in the rightfulness of slavery in marriage when you say you would murder your wife or any one who could give her more happiness than you could. The person who owns a woman to the extent that he believes he has a right to kill her, or to kill another who would deprive him of his property, cannot imagine any happiness in a community where companionship must come from attraction. The slave owners of the south had a similar view regarding the condition should negroes be freed. Men have been called out of their houses and shot before the eyes of wife and children for daring to invade the "sacred rights" of the slave owner. I come from an ancestry of abolitionists and I know of some of their sufferings. . .

"If a free lover should come monkeying around," you say. This "monkeying around" is, I suppose, a part of the vocabulary of the man who believes in "sacred" things, who "curses" those whom he does not like, and murders those who are more attractive to his "property" than himself. It is a term I do not hear among students of the social question, and seems to me out of place in a serious consideration of this question; and it is only as a serious question, one affecting the happiness of the human race, that I care to write on it.

Of course a "love baby" would not be attractive to you, as you do not believe in love; but I think all babies should be love babies, and when husbands and wives cease to love there should be no more babies. . . .

The freedom to think means nothing without the freedom to live the thought. To say that Bruno had a right to think there was more than one world implies his right to express that thought. To me freethought means the right to think on any question, and to express the thought in language and live it. Every one should have the right to do that which does not invade the equal right of every other person. . . .

"Cultivation of Personal Magnetism."

[The following quotations are made from a circular letter sent out by Leroy Berrier. The book may be ordered from this office].

In the production of my books, "Creative Force and Sexual Natures," a book now under the ban of the censors, much time was spent in the investigation and consideration of the creative force of the universe as it is manifested in human nature. This "vital force," "life force" and "personal magnetism." We know that it is the elixir of life, and that they who possess a large amount of it are, figuratively speaking, the capitalists in life; they are the kings and queens in mental and physical power and vigor; happiness is their priceless jewel. The fountain from which flows this summum bonum of life is a great volume of life force or personal magnetism.

I have learned that the common idea that possession of a large or small amount of personal magnetism is entirely due to inheritance is wrong, and that any person of sufficient intelligence to apply certain regulations can cultivate personal magnetism. Since I learned these facts I have set to work and formulated a system of brain and nerve culture that will create and maintain personal magnetism. My investigations revealed that there is direct access to the life force through the sexual nature; that most people create life force enough to make them capitalists in it, but they are not for the reason that they unconsciously waste it or, stating it differently, they have not complete control of it. A part of my purpose in the production of the book, "Cultivation of Personal Magnetism," is to teach the conservation of life force and still increase our natural enjoyment through all the faculties.

"Cultivation of Personal Magnetism." Price, $1; postage four cents. Address Leroy Berrier, 322 Thirteenth Ave., Minneapolis, Minn.

Epsom-On-the-Hill.

On and after July 1, the Old House will be open to guests.

Epsom, N. H., is seventy-nine miles distant from Boston, on the Southern division of the Boston and Maine railroad. Trains leave Boston at 8:30 a. m. and 3 p. m.

Railroad station is three miles distant from the hill, village and postoffice two miles. The house is surrounded by farm lands, with woods and brook near by. Delicious air and pure water. Quiet and restful. Large sunny rooms. Board by the day or week.

Parents wishing to board children in the country where, for a few hours daily they can receive practical instruction in gardening and farming, and where attention, quite homespun in kind, will be given to their well being, can obtain further information on application. Address all communications to Josephine S. Tilton, P. O. Box 55, Epsom, N. H.

"Cuba's Fight for Freedom and the War With Spain."

However much the readers of Lucifer may differ in regard to the rightness or the unrightners of the part taken by the American government in the war of "Intervention" in Cuba's behalf, we are all interested in the past history and the future prospects of this "Queen of the Antilles," as this famous island has often been called. A friend has donated for Lucifer's benefit a few copies of a large and handsomely bound volume with the above title. The book claims to be: "A Comprehensive, Accurate and Thrilling History of the Spanish Kingdom and its Latest and Fairest Colony; the long struggle of Cuba for Freedom and Independence; the Intervention of the United States and the Fierce War with Spain that Followed; A Record of Oppression and Patriotism, of Cruelty and Valor, and above all of the Triumph of the Stars and Stripes. Profusely illustrated. Written and edited by Henry Houghton Beck, author of 'Famous Battles,' the 'Greco-Turkish War,' etc., etc. Published by the Globe Publishing Co., Philadelphia.

The book contains 569 pages, heavy paper, excellent print; price in half Morocco, with marbled edges, $2; same in cloth, $1.50. On receipt of price and 17 cents for postage, we will send by post or express one copy of this handsomely bound and profusely illustrated volume—including a twenty-inch map of Cuba and Porto Rico, and Lucifer one year. As our supply of this book is quite limited, those who wish to avail themselves of this liberal offer will do well to send in their orders soon.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Elsie Cole Wilcox, Lawrence, Wash.—I see my subscription will expire in about ten weeks, and as poverty is a chronic complaint, I will send you fifty cents now to extend it half a year for fear I may not have even "two bits" when the ten weeks have gone by. I don't want to miss a copy of Lucifer. It is like being disappointed when expecting a visit from an old friend. Lucifer and I—or rather some of its contributors and I—have had some friendly little "scraps," but they have left no scars on me, and I hope it is the same with "the other fellow." Your father's letter in No. 760 is very interesting, but I am sorry he does not regain his health. I think perhaps it would be better for him if he did not travel around so much. It seems to me he needs rest more than change of scene. But there are so many who want to see him, and he is so obliging and so energetic, I suppose it is hard for him to keep still. No. 760 is an excellent number all through. C. L. James' article on Mary Shelley is interesting, and there is a "big square meal" of thought food in "Why the Difference?" And Nellie hits the nail squarely in the head in her solution to her conundrum. I have been looking over my stock o Lucifers today, and made up some bundles to send away where I hope they will be read with interest and profit. With my renewal I send ten cents for Dr. Greer's "Sanctity of Marriage." Hope you are all well and that "our Moses" will soon be better.

"Rocky Mountains:"—In order that your correspondent from far-away London, "A Son of Toil," may not think that his plaint falls on deaf ears, I desire to tell him that in my opinion his situation is this: He has to choose between continually living with a drunken drab who tells him she hates him, or leave her. If he leaves her he gratifies her expressed wish. If he stays with her he runs the risk of losing his own soul without doing her's any good. In view of the facts as stated in your issue of May 20, I have this to say. If the case was my own I think I would leave her decidedly. The only question in my mind is relative to the providing for the children, if there are any. He must not leave the children under the control, guidance and teaching of any such woman. They must be saved if possible. If there is any possible chance to save her he should try it; this is his duty. The principle for him to act on is the soundest principle of ethics and social economy: "Do unto others as you would wish others to do to you." And because this was inculcated by Jesus Christ does not lessen its worth or utility in the least. Or if he desires another one—take that of John Stuart Mill: "The greatest good of the greatest number, with the least possible injury to any; that is moral; the reverse immoral." Principles are compasses—and if you have the right compass too steer by you will reach the right—there or thereabouts.

W. W. M., New Haven, Conn.—In May 13 number of Lucifer I read your article, referring to the letter you had received from a young Western mother who had had the courage and independence to "get" (as she expressed it) for herself a baby in her own free way. Now I believe in freedom of action, and yet I dare not practice my own belief, but I have great admiration for those who dare, and thereon is based my principal reason for admiring yourself, and now I admire this young woman, and I don't know of any better way to express that admiration and also my approval of her act, than to send twenty-five cents for the baby's picture and mother's autograph, as is suggested by your article. I believe that all persons claiming to be liberals and freethinkers should encourage all such acts, and in accordance with that belief I send the twenty-five cents. I enjoy very much reading about your father's experience on his vacation trip, but I think at the same time, "Why in the world doesn't he just rest!" If he has gone off for a vacation and for rest and for the benefit of his health, why doesn't he rest and not bother himself about writing articles for Lucifer? His articles are very interesting, but still he might safely leave the conducting of Lucifer to you, as you have so thoroughly proven yourself capable of managing it successfully. His experience related in the May 20 number of looking for a dollar-a-day house, amused me not a little, because it brought to my memory experiences of my own. At the same time I realized a feeling of indignation to think that the poor, dear man should be compelled to economize and look for cheap accommodations, when I feel that he is worthy of enjoying the best that the world affords. I think if I undertake to say anything in praise of the way that Lucifer has been conducted in his absence, that I will make my letter too long, so I will only say that to me it has been thoroughly satisfactory, and I cannot see how it could have been improved.

Songs of the Unblind Cupid.

Under the title "Songs of the Unbind Cupid" an edition de luxe, in red and black, of a few hitherto unpublished poems by the liberal poet, J. Wm. Lloyd, is just issued.

The verses are printed from Kelmscott type upon deckle-edged, hand-made paper of cerulean tint. Covers brown, with choice of silver or gold lettering.

Initial letters, ornaments and borders are in red, and an initial letter and sketch upon the opening page are hand painted in water colors.

Mr. Lloyd, as author of "Wind Harp Songs" and the "Red Heart in a White World," needs no introduction to the liberal public. These few new poems of love, liberty and nature are here preserved in the highest style of the printers' art, and should find a place in the collection of every friend of freedom, every lover of poetry and every admirer of choice and dainty publications.

Edition limited to 650 copies. There will be no second edition.

THE BALLAD OF READING JAIL. BY C. 3.3.

This powerful poem of more than 600 lines, is the work of OSCAR WILDE C. 3. 3. having been the poets prison number during his confinement in Reading Jail. It is dedicated to the memory of a trooper of the Horse Guards who was hanged in the jail at that time, and it depicts the terrible sensations of the author and his fellow prisoners before and after the execution.

Just issued; price, in cloth, blue, vellum back, beautifully printed from large type on hand-made antique paper, deckle edges; reading matter on one side of the paper; a sumptuous book of 50 pages, 7 inches by 5. $1. In paper, 44 pages, 10 cents. Mailed postpaid on receipt of price, by M. Harman, 507 Carroll Avenue, Chicago.

THE WORKS OF A PIONEER SHOULD NOT BE OVERLOOKED.

The following by WILLIAM DENTON, pioneer Freethought and Spiritualist lecturer, and naturalist, who died while on a journey of scientific research in the wilds of Australia some fifteen years ago, are of as vital importance now as when they were written:

Sermons from Shakespeare's Text:
"Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything."

Orthodoxy False, Since Spiritualism is True.
The God Proposed for Our National Constitution,
What is Right?
Man's True Saviors.
Christianity No Finality or Spiritualism Superior to Christianity.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 256 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and Scientific Price, 10 cents.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 20 cents per dozen.

The Outcome of Legitimation, By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

The Story of An African Farm. Olive Schreiner's master piece. A story of the struggle for light, the search for truth, the yearning for happiness of bright young English and German people, among the ignorant and coarse Boers and Kaffirs of South Africa. This is a work of art, and of truth. Well bound in cloth. 288 pages. Price 40 cents, postage 10 cents. For sale at this office.

MyFriend.

BY JAY CAMERON.

My friend is a dissolute drunkard,
A vagabond, so you might say,
Shiftless and void of ambition,
Throwing his chances away;
For my friend is a fellow of talent,
His intellect none can surpass.
I could tell why his life is a failure
If my friend had a bosom of glass.

There's a charm in his mere conversation
That draws me, because I can feel
That it speaks of a soul's desolation
Which he tries in his pride to conceal.
"Every life is a tragedy gruesome,"
I have heard him say often. Alas!
I might help him to bear his life burden
If my friend had a bosom of glass.

In a popu ous world he is lonely,
His soul seeks companions in vain
Who knows but an error prenatal
He expistes now in his pain?
Pythagoras taught transmigration
Of the souls of the dead. Do they pass
Into earth-life again? I might answer
If my friend had a bosom of glass.

I might find in its saturine cloister
Driven back from the Stygian shore
The genius whose burden "The Raven"
Revealed in the word "Nevermore;"
Or the swan who sang sweet of "Endymion;"
Or of Chatterton; for of their class
Is his soul, and the whole world would know it
If his bosom were only of glass.

Theodora.

BY C. L. JAMES.

In the sixth century of our era a discerning person might easily have discerned, as it is said a few philosophers did, that a great darkness was about to fall upon mankind. The Roman Empire, that singular fabric of statecraft, which, by combining the reconcilable elements of Asiatic despotism and superstition with Grecian culture and Latin skill in the arts of diplomacy and war has perpetuated what was worst in all three civilizations—this Struldbrug of humanity was evidently passing into dotage. Everywhere the forces were being transferred to his adopted children, the barbarians of the north, who still revere his valetudinarian immortality, but who were as yet far too rough for the arts which had adorned his youth. That they would come to appreciate and to improve on this part of their inheritance, and that under their auspices, novelties destined to create a higher state were already beginning to appear was true, but less likely to be understood.

The most striking phenomenon of the time was that the paralytic occasionally mustered up energy enough to chastise his quarreling step-sons. The whole philosophy of this stage of the family history of civilization is illustrated by the two greatest regal names of the period—the names of Justinian and Theodora.

The emperor Justinian, the builder of St. Sophia, the codifier of those laws bequeathed him by twelve centuries of the most legislative among nations; the extinguisher of decayed Athenian philosophy and equally decrepit Roman bureaucracy; the restorer of imperial authority in Africa and Italy; the conqueror of the Vandals and Goths, was born at an unknown date of barbarian peasant parents, near Sardica, in what is now Bulgaria.

His sonorous Latin name is but a translation of the Gothic Upranda, by which he was baptized. His uncle, Justin, of origin equally obscure, had followed the usual path to greatness—gone up to Constantinople, served the crown as life guardsman, general, senator and at last usurped it for himself. Old, and unable to read or write, he called to his assistance his nephew, who nine years later promoted his retirement from the world.

Justinian's ambition appears to have been stimulated, his disagreement with his dying benefactor was undoubtedly caused by his passion for Theodora. The lives of these two famous sovereigns are given us almost exclusively in the "Wars," the "Edifices" and the "Anecdotes" of Procopius. The first two volumes extol Justinian as the greatest among conquerors, legislators and patrons of art. The latter, written after the author's friend Belisarius had been disgraced, is a virulent tirade against this adulated prince, adorned with still more savage abuse of his consort.

Theodora, we are informed, was so insatiable in vice as to be unsatisfied with ten lovers at a time, and though no continence could be expected to resist her seductive exhibitions in the theater, her evil fate still opposed an insuperable barrier to her gratification—it was easier to exhaust the strength of the body than to appease desire. Lest this should not be enough, the libeler goes on to offer an explanation—the devil having designed her for himself drove away her lovers, as in the story of "Tobit," but secretly whispered in her ear the comforting assurance that she should espouse the greatest of kings; all of which was fulfilled when she met Justinian, for he was in fact the Devil, as numerous holy men and others whose eyes were opened to behold him in his true form attest.

Stories so outrageous might be left as self-disproved, even if Procopius wrote the "Anecdota," which is not quite certain. But when we have rejected everything which rests on no better authority, it seems clear that Theodora began life as a pantomime actress in the Byzantine theatre, a profession legally classed with that of a prostitute.* She did not sing, play nor dance; her beauty and talent for licentious burlesque were her recommendations to public applause. She was small, graceful, with regular features, eyes expressive of every change in the senti-

*"Mulieres scenicæ, libertinæ, tabernariæ" are all classed together (with other profligate characters) in a statute of 326 and 454 A. D. Cod. Just. l. v. tit. v. leg. 7, tit. xxvii leg. 1. This clause was repealed by novels 89 and 117, about 531 A. D. under the name of Justin, but really by Justinian. The old statute forbade a senator to marry any of these degraded persons and except for the clause above cited it remained intact.

The courage of Theodora was signally displayed upon a memorable, though ridiculous occasion. Mankind must have something to quarrel about. Politics had long been tabooed, and religion, under the stern despotism of the Lower Empire, was almost as much forced upon acceptance as law. The instinct of faction found gratification in the contests of the arena. The most important of those colors worn by charioteers and other competitors for prizes are called by modern writers green and blue. As everybody bet heavily, the judges were seldom impartial. Their corrupt decisions provoked terrific riots in the crowded theaters, where thousands of deeply interested spectators had assembled. Omens drawn from the success of one color or another engaged on opposite sides the most important callings, such as the agriculturist and the sailor; so that a tumult might easily be the beginning of a sectional rebellion.

Religious bigotry grasped at a new means of inflaming passion. The Blues boasted of their orthodoxy; the Greens could not deny that they had been favored by heretical sovereigns. The former, now believed to have the imperial ear, brought in a new and deadly element of strife—the racial. They assumed the dress of Huns, and their bullies emulated in peaceful Constantinople the outrages perpetrated by these barbarians in the Danubian wars. Theodora had no wish to conceal her theatrical preferences, but Justinian affected impartiality, and in the fifth year of his reign seven criminals of both factions stood marked for death a the very time the games were going on. The ensuing riot, which began as a fight between the parties, was soon changed to an insurrection for the common purpose of rescuing the prisoners. The prefect's house was burnt; the emperor's (barbarian) troops, sent out to disperse the mob, succeeded in rousing the whole city by disregarding the sanctity of the churches. They were repulsed by the furious multitude. One of those immense conflagrations to which Constantinople has always been liable, destroyed the Cathedral of St. Sophia; a large hospital, in which the patients perished, part of the palace and a great portion of the city. The insurgents, Blue and Green, agreed in demanding a redress of grievances. But though Justinian yielded so far as to dismiss his ministers, one of whom was the celebrated Tribonian, they still disturbed him, and the Greens procured the coronation of a rival emperor, descended from an obsolete dynasty.

At a palace conference, where Belisarius was present, it was proposed to fly from the revolted city. But Theodora declared that she would never leave Constantinople alive, and she found a means of victory when the first general of the age despaired. By affecting to be neither a Blue nor a Green, Justinian had united the factions against himself. But there could be no question about the blueness of Theodora, a star actress whose record had become the best known in the world.†† Her emissaries represented to the Blues the absurdity of joining hands with their inveterate enemies upon any consideration. Her name operated as a magic talisman; the Greens deserted by their unnatural allies were put down, and the theatre was judiciously closed for several years.

The factions continued, however, to disturb the public peace for a long time, and the next sovereign opened his reign with a proclamation addressed in these significant terms to both:

"Blues! remember that Justinian is dead. Greens! you may consider that he is still alive."

In the Philippines.

BY CLINTON LOVERIDGE.

With white man's burden on either hand
The Church has entered the heathen's land:
God and the State is the doom of all—
Bible and rum and powder and ball.

††According to the Anecdotes and the notes of Alemanna, her father, Acacius, was a Green, and keeper of the bears exhibited in the arena. His widow and children, neglected by the Greens, attached themselves to the Blues. Not only Procopius, but Evagrius and Malala intimate that however it might be with Justinian, all justice was denied to Greens by the more affectionate partiality of Theodora.

ment she acted; her complexion, though slightly pale, owed nothing to art, and her form, which was amply displayed, defied the sculptor's imitative powers. It is stated, however, that she had reformed before receiving any pecuniary assistance from Justinian.† He married her before he was invested with the crown, even as colleague of his uncle; and as soon as he could he bestowed on her an unprecedented honor. All subordinate governors were required to swear allegiance to Justinian and Theodora.

We may place such an example beside those of Antony, Pericles, Alcibiades, Nelson, Mahomet, Belisarius and a great many more, to prove that men, whatever their own character, may respect women who observe the conventions, but love only those who have dared to break them.

Justinian was the most unlikely of mankind to be caught by sensual allurements. His ruling passion was ambition, which he served by the severest exercise of emancipation from carnal things. He was not a warrior who must needs nourish the body, though he ordered and planned great wars. His abstinence from wine and other table luxuries was monkish. He appreciated the power of knowledge, and at a mature age acquired a learned education. He understood the importance of pleasing the clergy, and never offended them except for the sake of Theodora. To all her other sins she added the unpardonable one of heresy. She aimed to bring Rome into spiritual subjection under Constantinople, and accordingly favored the Eutychian theology, which was condemned by the Vatican, but popular in the East. Justinian professed to be orthodox in theory, but in administration he was advised by Theodora. He acquired the power of making the Roman pontiffs, which his successors retained for nearly two hundred and seventy years.

In no small degree the glorious administration of Justinian was that of Theodora. He distinctly attributes to her the great enterprise of codifying the Roman law.‡ She was the discoverer of his general, Belisarius, to whom most of his victories were due. Her enemies inform us that her spies made her mistress of the whole executive machinery.§

Meanwhile she avoided pomp and lived mostly in a sequestered retreat upon the Sea of Marmora. The personal chastity of her life after marriage is attested by her maligners' silence. Thinking and working hard, she took pains to relax sufficiently, slept long and used every art to preserve her beauty. She did not choose it should be said she was ungrateful for her escape from a life of shame.

She bought girls from the brothels, collected five hundred in a magnificent asylum, and when some of them, dissatisfied with the ennui of their life, committed suicide, she released, with a present, such as chose to try the world again.‖

She died of cancer in the twenty-fourth year of her marriage, 548 A. D., "and the irreparable loss was deplored," says Gibbon, "by her husband, who, in the room of a theatrical prostitute might have selected the purest and most noble virgin of the East."

Justinian had reason to mourn, for with Theodora departed the glory of the Roman Empire. Treachery, defeat and shame succeeded the withdrawal of that cool head and vigilant eye. It was only in the last years of his reign that fortune was in some measure and for a short time restored by a creature of the departed Empress—the eunuch Narses.* *

*The more we scrutinize the accounts of Malala, Theophanes and Procopius, the more evidence we shall find that Theodora managed the dangerous machinery of a military despotism as Justinian could not. He was unable to do without Belisarius, but was afraid to trust him. Theodora governed him through her friend Antonina, his wife. Mention has been made of those new arts which adorn the dreary record of the Dark Ages. No person is more likely than Theodora to have stimulated that enterprise which resulted during her period in the introduction of silk worms into Europe.

Nature's Aristocracy.

From "Illegitimacy," by Albert Leffingwell, M. D.

The world could ill spare all upon the accident of whose birth it puts a social stigma. Some of the greatest soldiers and adventurers of ancient and modern times, from William the Conqueror of England to Pizarro the Conqueror of Peru; from Marechal de Saxe to General Burgoyne—not to speak of a greater than them all, in our own time—might have borne the bar sinister upon their escutcheon.

The most brilliant name in French journalism for forty years Emile de Girardin, gained his position in literature by his genius, despite an openly acknowledged illegitimate origin.

There died in France a few years ago an ecclesiastic than whom few more eloquent or far-sighted has the nation ever known; upon whom the Church conferred its highest honor, whom the French Academy raised to a seat among its Immortals; yet the Bishop of Orleans was the son of a maid-servant at a Swiss inn and knew no father.

Who that visits Washington, the American capital, suspects that the only National Museum of the great Republic, the "Smithsonian Institution," founded "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," was the generous gift, more than half a century ago, to a nation then insignificant in numbers, from the natural son of an English duke?

When, a century ago, the American colonies had emerged from their conflict with the mother-country, it was chiefly the genius of one man who laid the foundation of that federal system, which, by a written constitution, moulded these discordant and petty States into the potentiality of a mighty nation; but Alexander Hamilton was of illegitimate birth, the son of a Scotch planter in the West Indies.

Philosophy, profiting by the studies of D'Alembert, one of the keenest mathematicians and most brilliant writers of the last century, does not identify the philosopher, honored by the courts of Catherine II. and Frederick the Great, and by the Vatican itself, with a poor foundling picked up in the gutters of Paris.

Literature forgets the stain of ignoble origin in Boccaccio, the father of Italian prose; in Erasmus of Rotterdam, the greatest name in the history of the Renaissance; in George Sand, the great grandchild of Maurice de Saxe, himself the natural son to Augustus, King of Saxony, or in Alexander Dumas of today, illegitimate son of a still more renowned father, who was grandson of a French marquis and a slave-woman of San Domingo.

Who that stands in the refectory of the Dominican Convent at Milan before the fading outlines of that matchless masterpiece—The Last Supper—remembers the story of Leonardo di Vinci's birth? Who that reads the story of Pharez connects him with the history of David?

Abraham Lincoln's Ancestry.

In writing of the recent outrages in the South "Bill Arp" comments regretfully on the fact that "through Republican influences" the negroes have "become so corrupted and demoralized that now the children do not know who are their fathers."

"I was ruminating about all this," he says, "and how these negroes have all been fooled about Grant and Lincoln being their friends and were fighting to free them, when there was not one word of truth in it. Neither of them cared a continental dime for the negro and both of them were more concerned about their own successes than anything else. . . I have recently received a little volume entitled 'The Genesis of Abraham Lincoln.' It is carefully and affectionately written by James H. Cathey, of Western North Carolina, and its unprejudiced perusal will convince any man that Abraham Lincoln was the son of Abraham Enloe, and that Nancy Hanks was a good orphan girl who served in Enloe's family. The affidavits and other evidences establish this beyond dispute. Old Father Abraham Enloe was a second Abraham, and poor Nancy Hanks a second Hagar and for the same reason she was sent away from the paternal homestead to keep peace in the family. The father of her child had great regard for her and placed her with his relatives in Kentucky, where she afterwards married Thomas Lincoln. Some of the witnesses of these facts are now ninety years old and have passed all desire to deceive anybody. The descendants of this Enloe family are numerous and their testimony has been taken from North Carolina, Missouri and Texas, and all confirm the story. All the very old people in North Carolina were familiar with the girl Nancy Hanks and the Enloe family and old man Enloe's acknowledgement of the child's paternity and why he sent this modern Hagar and her Ishmael away.

"But this is no new thing. During the war it was talked of in the army and Lincoln was denounced by the entire Todd family, into which he married. Fifteen years ago, while I sojourned in Western North Carolina, I found a story current that Abraham Lincoln was the son of Abraham Enloe and was named for him by his mother, Nancy Hanks. Now, Mr. Cathey writes a pretty little book about it, and his excuse is that the truth cannot hurt the living or the dead; that Abraham Lincoln was the most remarkable man and there should be no attempt to cloud the life of a real hero. Cicero says the first law of history is that it should neither care to say anything that is false nor fear to say anything that is true.

It is, therefore, the sole purpose of this little book to prove that this wonderful man was not without ancestors. His mother was Nancy Hanks. If he was the son of a worthy sire, the world is entitled to know who that sire was, whence he came and what his characteristics. The custodians of this history of Abraham Lincoln are numbered by scores and hundreds of people—men and women of western North Carolina, for the Enloes were a large and influential family and their descendants have remarried with many distinguished people. But I do not propose to review the book. It is an interesting and remarkable revelation and is written by an enthusiastic admirer of Mr. Lincoln, and establishes beyond question his paternity. Abraham Enloe was himself an extraordinary man—the father of thirteen children, and his photographic likeness to this particular son is very striking, both in form and feature. Both were the same height and had the same long unshapely limbs."

This is very interesting information; though one is inclined to wonder what Lincoln's parentage has to do with the alleged fact that the negro is unfit for freedom.

Legal Standing of a "Wife"

"A married woman, being a mere housewife for her husband, and he being bound for her support, her earnings belong to him, and any loss of time occasioned by his wife's injury is solely his loss; therefore, her husband only can recover damages and the wife's claim is not valid, as the time lost is not her time."

Such is the decision of the Iowa Supreme Court. How grateful we should be for the protection afforded us in legal marriage

Forgiveness.

Forgive you? Oh, of course, dear—
A dozen times a week!
We women were created
Forgiveness but to speak.

You'd die before you'd hurt me
Intentionally? True.
But it is not, O dearest,
The thing you mean to do!

It's what you do, unthinking,
That makes the quick tear start.
The tear may be forgotten,
But the pain stays in the heart.

And though I may forgive you
A dozen times a day,
Yet each forgiveness wears, dear,
A little love away!

LUCIFER, THE LIGHT-BEARER

PUBLISHED AT 507 CARROLL AVE., CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

M. HARMAN, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.

Eastern Representative, E. C. Walker, 244 W. 143d st., N. Y.
European Representative, William Duff, 9 Carfin St., Glasgow Scotland.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents

THE FRIENDS of the editor of Lucifer who would like to greet him on his return from his journey, are invited to meet at 507 Carroll Avenue, Sunday evening, June 11.

SOME VANDAL entered the Public Library recently and cut one hundred pages from Sir Richard Burton's translation of "The Arabian Nights." Carry the glorious news to Comstock.

Home Again.

Yielding to the advice of friends and helpers near and far away, on the morning of January 3, of this current year, I took train for the "Sunny South," hoping to find renewal of strength and health in the "land of the pine, the palm and the palmetto." After an absence of five months I find myself once more in the sanctum of the Light Bearer, with strength and health very materially improved—though not yet fully restored—and with a fairly good appetite or desire to again take up the routine work necessary to the weekly publication of the "Morning Star," including also the publication and distribution of books, pamphlets and leaflets that we think will be helpful to the general educational work to which the said weekly is devoted.

Among the changes that have taken place in this world of mutations during my somewhat prolonged absence from the post of duty, is a change of location of Lucifer's office. This change had been long in contemplation, the chief obstacle thereto being the time, labor and cost of removal. Now that the dread ordeal is over, or mainly so, we all feel pleased and gratified with the result—thanks to Lillian and to all the good friends who kindly assisted her in this arduous work, and to all who have in any way helped to strengthen her hands in the work of getting out the weekly issues of the paper, and in keeping the educational ball rolling.

Once more thanking all who have contributed in any way to make my vacation a pleasant one, and to make my search for health successful I close, for lack of time, hoping in next issue to continue my report or notes of travel during an outing long to be remembered by one whose vacations have not always been of his own choosing. M. HARMAN.

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

The "Co-Operator," organ of the Co-operative brotherhood, Olalla, Wash., in speaking of the causes of inharmony in other colonies says: "While we are tolerant of opinions we must condemn acts, especially such as these opinions lead to in the concrete. Notice will be served on those who believe in the promiscuity idea (falsely termed free love) that we do not desire their presence in the colony."

I have no quarrel with the colonists for wishing to choose their associates. If it pleases them to have in their colony only those whose desire for free thought and a free life is willingly limited by the thought of their neighbors, it is best that they should so state their desires. There is no imminent danger of the "Brotherhood" owning the entire earth, and so for a few years there probably will be room for all of us. But I am rather curious to know what the social radicals who are already in the colony will do—whether they will suppress expression of their thought or relieve the colony of their presence. I frequently notice the names of radicals among the highly praised members of the Brotherhood. I wonder how they enjoy belonging to a society which practically accuses them of preaching "promiscuity" and advocating "free lust."

By the way, we have been told again and again by our Socialistic friends that discussion of the social question is a sad waste of time; that "under Socialism the question will settle itself." If we are to judge by the small Socialistic experiments which we now have with us, this is true. The question will be settled—settled as the fabled wolf settled with the lamb the question of the muddy stream. Under the bitterly condemned "competitive system" we can smile and let them go their way; but "under Socialism"——?

In writing of the Moore case, the editor of the "Quarterly Christian" says: "Neither do we object to his right to say and print what he pleases. Not the right to speak, but the thing spoken is what we oppose. In a free country each man has the right to say what he pleases, but for all his saying and doing he is responsible both to God and man."

Probably our Christian editor, and our Socialistic editor as well, may be able to sympathize with Sir Boyle Roach when he exclaimed: "Confound those ancients, they have stolen our best thoughts!" Good, conscientious inquisitors from the day of the first man who sought to regulate the lives of his neighbors in those neighbors' interests, have justified their action on the ground that people had a right to think as they chose, but when it came to expressing that thought in word or deed, they were responsible to "meinself und Gott!"

"The Quarterly Christian" is an organ of a Protestant sect—the Campbellite. Its editor upholds the freedom to revolt from the teachings and many of the practices of "Mother Church," and also to ignore the teachings of the multitude of other sects. He would, of course, hold that in expressing his free thought he was not injuring either "God or man." Our Socialistic editor believes in the rightfulness of his revolt from the established commercial system and believes he has a right to freely express his thought regarding trusts and other features of the system of which he does not approve.

In spite of their reactionary tendencies, both these advocates of widely differing schools of thought are helping along the cause of progress more than they know. They help to arouse thought, and the thought which they arouse will not in every instance, by any means, be confined within their proscribed limits. So "more power" to our conservative friends, even though they do desire to use power to restrict the free expression of the the thought of others.

"Here's freedom to him that wad read,
Here's freedom to him that wad write."

For only by means of willingly granted freedom of expression to even reactionary sentiments can we hope to attain universal freedom of expression.

This thought has often occurred to me: How many advocates of freedom along some special line would not have drawn back in horror could they have foreseen the wider liberty into which their special teaching would have become merged, and for which that teaching would even become authority!

In writing of the Reformation, Ridpath says it "builded better than it knew or willed. It set the example of a successful insurrection against Rome, and gave to others the precedent for a successful insurrection against itself. And the world has been by so much the gainer."

Two souls with but a single thought?
Who marvels much thereat?
We've often seen more souls than two
With fewer thoughts than that.

Was Sam Hose Burned for a Crime He Did Not Commit?

The negroes of Chicago sent a private detective to Georgia to investigate the burning of Sam Hose, and the crime for which he was burned. The detective made his report at a meeting held in Bethel church last Sunday.

"Hose had been employed by Cranford," he said, "and in a quarrel over wages Cranford ran into his house and came out again with a revolver. As he was about to shoot Hose seized an ax and threw it at him. The ax struck Cranford in the head and killed him instantly. Hose fled to avoid arrest. Mrs. Cranford, who witnessed the tragedy, said herself that Hose did not say a word to her, or in any way touch her."

If this report is true, it should be given as great publicity as were the reports of Hose's alleged crime. But will it be given such publicity? Certainly not.

If the detective has lied in the interest of his employers it should be easy to prove the falsity of his statement.

"But," it will be claimed, "even though Hose was guiltless of the crime of rape, he was guilty of the crime of manslaughter." True. And it is also true that many other men are guilty of that crime. For instance, we often have murders here in Chicago. Yet will any one claim that it would be an edifying or elevating sight, or in any way beneficial to the community if we should have a living bonfire down on the Lake Front every time a murder is committed? Monopolies and Combines.

BY R. B. KERR.

In No. 759 the editor of Lucifer says:

"Trusts are the legitimate and necessary outgrowth of the competitive system, supplemented as that system is by protective privileges granted by law to certain lines of industry and supplemented also by a land and money system which practically says, 'To him that hath it shall be given and he shall have abundance, but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he seemeth to have.'"

If the writer had simply said, "Trusts are the legitimate and necessary outgrowth of the competitive system," he would have stated the Alpha and the Omega of the whole matter. The competitive system needs no supplements to promote the growth of monopolies and trusts. Monopoly is the natural-born child of competition, and all that is needed to bring it into life is absolute freedom from legal restraint.

Monopolies and trusts spring from two causes:

1. In all occupations the great majority of competitors are finding that it pays them better to combine than to compete.

2. That majority can, by the simple power of combination, enforce its will on the minority and the public.

Take the case of labor unions, which are perfect examples of combines. A combine is simply a body of men who say to the world, "Either you shall deal with us, or you shall not deal at all; and if you deal with any of our number, you shall do so on conditions laid down by us collectively." That is the principle of all combines, including the combines called labor unions.

Now it is well known, that except in New Zealand, labor unions have no legal monopoly of any kind. They are the weakest of combines, because they have only their labor to dispose of. The capitalist can often wait for years; the laborer must soon starve if he does not work.

Nevertheless, consider what these combines have accomplished, in spite of their natural weakness. In most parts of Australia they are absolute masters of the situation. In Melbourne practically every kind of labor, skilled or unskilled, is organized in unions, and no employer would venture to employ a non-union man, or any man on other than union terms.

In England the whole coal mining industry is dominated by trades unions, and wages are fixed, not by contracts between individuals, but by a sliding scale fixed by agreement between representatives of capital and the officials of the trades unions.

In America the large alien population has kept labor unions weak; but yet in many places their power is absolute. In Butte, the largest American mining camp, the union has an absolute monopoly of underground work, and in the Coeur d'Alene camp in Idaho, although the Bunker Hill and Sullivan mine has been fighting the union, yet all the other mines have for years employed only union men on union terms.

If labor, with everything against it, can make exclusive combines, how much easier must it be for those who have access to land and capital to do the same. Take railroad corporations, for example.

In the first place, every railroad is, and must always be, a natural monopoly in most parts of its territory. After leaving Minnesota, the main line of the Great Northern Railway runs through more than one thousand miles of territory before it touches a town of five thousand people. Most of the places which it touches have only a station, with perhaps a saloon and a store. Manifestly, even when the population is as dense as that of Belgium there will at most of them be only room for one railway. Manifestly at all such places the railway has the people entirely under its thumb. Every pound of groceries they buy they owe to the railway; nor can they get their produce to the markets of the country without the railway. If the railway wishes to kill a town it has only to run its trains through without stopping. If it wishes to build up a rival town it has only to stop its trains a mile or two further along the line.

What exactly would the people along such a railway gain by abolition of laws? What would they gain by free trade, or by free land, or by the abolition of the money monopoly? Nothing whatsoever. If these things increased prosperity, the railway would simply raise freight rates, and put the whole of the increased prosperity in its own pocket. Make the railway free from all legal restraints and you have simply delivered the people into the irresistible power of an almighty highwayman.

So much for the places where a railway has a natural monopoly. Now for those in which there is a little competition. Two railways run into a town. Must the people then be prosperous? Not unless the railway companies are very stupid. For what is to hinder them getting together and agreeing on a uniform rate? That is just what they do in every case. Instead of foolishly cutting each other's throats for the benefit of the people they agree upon a rate, and they make that rate with a view to dividends, not with a view to philanthropy.

How perfect these combines are, we learnt last year. About the beginning of 1898 transcontinental rates felt very low. One day in September they were suddenly doubled on every railway across the continent. How was it done? Simply by agreement.

The railway trusts now being formed are merely improved combines. Sometimes the members of the combines quarrel and cut rates, much to the satisfaction of the people. The trusts are being formed to prevent these little mishaps in the future.

Suppose there were no legal monopoly of trade, land, or money, would that make the slightest difference to railway combines? Not the slightest. There would probably be more railways, but those railways would be combined against the public as firmly as ever. There are about five hundred railway companies in the United States, but those railways were one in the combine of last September. Free land, free trade, and free money might make those five hundred railways one thousand, but they would not change the economic laws and human nature. If it pays five hundred railways better to combine than to compete, it will not pay one thousand to compete instead of combining. The fact that a high rate fixed by agreement is better than a low rate caused by suicidal competition does not depend on numbers.

The abolition of legal restraints would in no respect weaken the combines, but it would strengthen them immensely. At present there is one great check on railway companies. As common carriers, they are bound by law to carry all comers and their goods at the current rates. Abolish that law, and you give the railroads the power of the boycott, which is overwhelming in the hands of a transportation company. Let a new railway line be started to compete against a railway trust, and the trust would kill it at once by refusing to make connections. The trust would not carry forward its goods to points which it did not reach, and would refuse to touch goods which were to be forwarded over the recalcitrant railroad. The little railway must join the trust or be ground into powder.

Suppose that a railway could boycott whom it pleased, and suppose a farmer arose in South Dakota and denounced the extortion of railway companies. What would be his fate? The railway would deny him supplies and would leave his wheat to rot in the fields.

These are not imaginary pictures. All the west of America is dotted with dead towns which the railroads have killed out of pure spite. The people held a meeting to protest against some railway abuse, and the railway ran its trains through the town without stopping and swept it from the map. Had railways the power to boycott individuals they would either starve every independent man to death or drive him from the country.

Where competition has died it can never live again. It was possible for a while in an age of transition, but it was too stupid to last. That men should cut one another's prices by competition when they can fix high prices by combination is a form of insanity which the world will never see again.

Meanwhile, we learn from the San Francisco "Argonaut" of May 1, that since the beginning of this year trusts have been formed in the United States with a capital equal to the wealth of the country as it was in 1890. Today there remain some glimmerings of competition; tomorrow it will belong entirely to the past.

Two courses lie before the people of the United States, and no third. They may either own the trusts or they may be owned by the trusts. But competition is dead, and the individual is dead. They have died a purely natural death, and no power on earth can ever galvanize them into life again.

REMARKS.

Having just now seen the article of friend Kerr, and as the time of going to press is near, I will take but little space in replying to the above. Evidently our British Columbian correspondent has made "Monopolies and Combines" a subject of careful study. A lawyer by profession, his advantages over a non professional are very great, when treating of monopolies and trusts in their relation to statute law.

In answer to the questions, "What would the people along the line of such a railway [or along the line of any railway] gain by the abolition of laws? What would they gain by free trade, or by free land, or by the abolition of the money monopoly?" I would briefly answer:

First. By the abolition of our present land laws the railway barons would be deprived of the power to run their trains through a town—township or other autonomous municipality, without leave of the inhabitants thereof. Abolition of our land laws would mean the abolition of the so-called right of "eminent domain." This would mean that the railroad companies would be put upon their good behavior. They must please the people through whose lands they lay their iron rails, else pull up their rails and go elsewhere. Land monopoly, that is, the power to own in fee simple all the land their money can buy, or all the land their political influence can get the free gift of from the paternal despotism called "government," is the tap-root of the tree of evil known as the Railway Trust.

Second. "Abolition of money monopoly," that is, abolition of the "legal tender" privilege now granted to gold—or to gold, silver and a very limited number of greenbacks, would put all commodities on equal footing before the law, including currency or money, and would deprive the railway combines of their power—their opportunity—to unite with the kings of finance to reduce the producing classes to a condition of helpless serfdom by limiting the supply of the natural vehicle of commerce, or of exchange of commodities—money! Thieves and robbers usually work in pairs or gangs for mutual protection, and the railway robber barons and legal tender or protected money barons are no exceptions to the rule.

The subject is much too large to be adequately treated in the small space and time at my command, and must be deferred to a more convenient season. M. HARMAN.

The Kansas Freethought Convention.

The officers of this organization are making a special effort to secure the attendance of Freethought editors at their annual meeting in Forest Park, Ottawa, Kas., June 27 to July 2.

W. H. Kerr writes a letter to the "Freethought Ideal" in which he agrees to contribute ten dollars toward the railroad expenses of the first ten editors who accept the invitation. "Can you not," he asks, "send a personal invitation to a number of leading Freethought editors to attend and address the meeting, and to ask their subscribers to bear the expense of their trip?"

The management promises board and lodging free to the editors who accept.

J. E. Remsburg, Mattie P. Krekel, Voltairine de Cleyre and Franklin Steiner are among the speakers expected.

Forest Park is a beautiful, restful place. It is on the banks of a small river, and under the shade trees is an ideal place for a vacation. There is a large auditorium, dormitories and cooking and dining halls, and the charge for board and lodging is very low. I spent a week there four years ago, and I "know whereof I speak."

We have received a circular letter containing a detailed statement of the prospects of this meeting, but it did not arrive early enough to find a place in this issue. Accompanying this was an urgent call for the editor of Lucifer, but I am not in possession of information as to whether he would wish to go away so soon after his return home.

Send to "Freethought Ideal," Ottawa, Kansas, for further particulars of the Convention. We hope that Lucifer's readers will be largely represented there, even though Lucifer's editor may be absent. L. H.

A Free Colony.

A newspaper dispatch, dated Amsterdam, May 10, reads as follows:

"AN AMERICAN CONVERT.

"The latest recruit received by the new Socialistic colony recently founded by Dr. Frederick Van Eeden in the province of North Holland, near the Zuider Zee, is a young girl fom New York.

"This community consists of forty colonists. Each has a small plot of land and lives in a hut constructed by himself. All the earnings go into a common fund.

"Dr. Van Eeden has given up his magnificent home in the city and lives in a hut in the colony. He, however, continues his extensive medical practice, giving all his fees to the colony.

"Speaking to the 'Journal' correspondent today he said: 'The object of my enterprise is to make life morally happy, pure and free, and as beautiful as possible. The colonists are under no restraint whatever. There is no code of laws; there are no distinctions of class or creed; no legal marriages, no social conventions.

"'We're all equal, working for ourselves and each other. I have named the colony Walden, after Thoreau's book, in which he describes perfectly my ideal of happy mundane existence.'"

If Dr. Van Eeden is permitted to practicalize his ideal undisturbed by legal procedure, it will be proof that there is more freedom in Holland than in the United States.

Success to these earnest workers for freedom!

Expect No Miracles!

Writing on the necessity of individual and organized effort in behalf of rationalism, F. J. Gould says in the "Literary Guide" of London:

"I am an enemy of superstition, in the church or out of it. I affirm that there is no evidence of the existence of a self-contained and independent entity, whose destiny is to spread the principles of rationalism. If men and women slumber, freedom of thought slumbers. If men and women are cowards, freedom of thought languishes in the sty of poltroonery. If men and women are brave, freedom of thought lifts up its head and sees redemption drawing nigh. And the expected miracle will never be wrought. Freedom of thought will never prosper apart from your efforts and mine. The iron will get hot only as we forge it! The sword will be shaped only as we beat it out with our hammers. The foe will fly only when we advance in the phalanx. The heavens will give us no sign. On the contrary, when we ourselves—you and I and the other man—wrestle and labor, offer our bodies and souls, the constellation of victory will glitter in the arching sky, and the music of conquest sound in our gladdened ears."

From Their Point of View.

"Wot say, guv'nor? Wot do I mean by walking over your ground? Well, I must walk over somebody's—I ain't got none o' my own."—Ally Sloper.

Watts—"What we want is some one who will make the Filipinos understand that American promises are not like Spanish promises."

Potts—"Good idea. Why not send a few American Indians to make the necessary explanation?"—Indianapolis Journal.

There was recently a notable dog show. I was there. Over the exhibition room a sign was placed in large letters:

"No smoking allowed here. It will hurt the dogs."

A morning daily reported the inscription.

"Good," exclaimed Hon. Percy Blount as he read it and laid down the newspaper and his cigar stump. "I am glad the dogs were so well protected. Hard enough to be kenneled all day without having their air spoiled in the bargain. Now a kiss for papa, darling, for he must be off," and, taking in his arms the idol of his heart, his two-year-old daughter, as fresh as a rose, he gave her a loving embrace and kiss. The child, shielding her lips with one tiny hand to prevent another, said:

"No papa," your mouf bites."—The New Voice.

VARIOUS VOICES.

Samuel Joy, Rockingham, N. H.:—I enclose one dollar for the best of all papers. Pleased to learn your long trip has been so pleasant, and has conduced so much to your health. I think your explanation of conscience in the last number of Lucifer is the best I have ever seen or heard given. Thus people locate something down in the chest that tells them right from wrong, and that they call conscience. But at different times of life it directs them differently, showing that "education forms the common mind; as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined." My judgment tells me the office of conscience is to impel one to conform to what one's education and judgment tells him is right, and to refrain from doing what one understands to be wrong. Thus we see that much depends upon latitude and longitude as to what one's conscience is likely to dictate.

John Jones, Braddock, Pa.:—I enclose $1.50—$1 on subscription to Lucifer, and 50 cents for "Health Hints" and "Woman in the Past, Present and Future." I am glad to know that our editor is enjoying his trip. I do not think he is getting so much rest as change of work and of scenes—that of course is rest—perhaps of the best kind. I sincerely hope that it may be of lasting benefit to him and be the means of keeping him for you and us for many years to come. Although I gladly see the paper is not suffering during his absence I should be grieved if you were overtaxing your strength. I think Lucifer the best paper I ever read; the one I should most miss. I think there can be no general and permanent betterment of the race until its teachings are generally accepted and lived up to. We must learn enough to be able to select the future dwellers on this planet; then there will be no unwelcome births, nor consequently miserable lives. I think that it is as unreasonable as it is unaccountable how any one can expect to read such a paper and not pay for its support; perhaps I would say unpardonable if I were not to a certain extent guilty. In extenuation all I have to offer is a plea of almost chronic poverty, which, with a certain amount of negligence will account for my shortcomings. I plead guilty and promise to try to do better in future.

Ed. W. Chamberlain, 111 W. 42 St., New York City:—I want you to post yourself and become interested in the case of Walter Hurt, editor of "The Gatling Gun," 593 American Trust Building, Cleveland, Ohio, who is now being prosecuted under the pretense that he mailed an obscene paper. This is the same old fake with which you are so familiar. The real purpose is to silence Hurt and stop his paper because he has pitched into the administration vigorously and vehemently and in a way to damage the calculations of "the second term syndicate." There is no more obscenity about his paper than there is about Lucifer, but the blackmail law is very convenient for purposes of retaliation upon an editorial antagonist, hence the present situation. I don't agree with all Mr. Hurt's views, but when an editor is assailed in this rascally manner and his right of free expression is attacked by this style of assassination it does not seem to be just the time to discuss our agreements or disagreements. It is the time to help him with all the sympathy and material aid we can command. You who have fought such a splendid fight against this sort of blackmail and who have enjoyed so large a measure of sympathy from the best citizens of this country, will, I am sure, appreciate this. So I ask you to keep your readers informed of the progress of the Hurt case and to keep them reminded of it by frequent reference to it.

H. L., Minn.:—Find enclosed five cents for "Love and the Law," and ten cents for "What the Young Need to Know." I have been for a number of years what you no doubt would call a free thinker, but have never dared to mention the fact to any one until just lately; and the reason why I can now do so is, I have been reading Lucifer and found I was not alone in the world. I think our present marriage system an abomination, a crime forced upon the human race, and it is a slavery of the first kind. And what surprises me is that women are such willing subjects who simply give themselves body and souls to men. Yes, and I am one among the many, and bore this all in silence until I read Lucifer. I cannot find words to express how happy I am that the chains are broken. I married a man at the age of eighteen because home relations were so unpleasant, and a previous engagement had been broken up by my mother, which caused me to be discouraged. The first year of my married life I was quite happy; but I soon found that I did not love the man whom I called husband. The result of married life is that I am today a physical wreck, for I thought as the man I had married was my husband I must submit. Oh! woman, when will you wake up to the fact that no man is owner of your body?

This husband of mine has very poorly supported his family. In the past ten years I have contrived in every way to keep up a respectable appearance so that the public would think we were so happy. For the past two years have been speaking in the Gospel Temperance and Social Purity movements. My husband has always tried to lay down the law in the family, above all things I must never converse with the opposite sex. Yet to me love is the legal tender of the soul. As soon as I can afford it I shall subscribe for Lucifer, and endeavor to get others interested in reading a sound, sensible paper.

Do these figures correspond with the number printed on the wrapper of your Lucifer? If so your subscription expires with this number. Please renew for another year.

Songs of the Unblind Cupid.

Under the title "Songs of the Unblind Cupid" an edition de luxe, in red and black, of a few hitherto unpublished poems by the liberal poet, J. Wm. Lloyd, is just issued.

The verses are printed from Kelmscott type upon deckle-edged, hand-made paper of cerulean tint. Covers brown, with choice of silver or gold lettering.

Initial letters, ornaments and borders are in red, and an initial letter and sketch upon the opening page are hand painted in water colors.

Mr. Lloyd, as author of "Wind Harp Songs" and the "Red Heart in a White World," needs no introduction to the liberal public. These few new poems of love, liberty and nature are here preserved in the highest style of the printers' art, and should find a place in the collection of every friend of freedom, every lover of poetry and every admirer of choice and dainty publications.

Edition limited to 650 copies. There will be no second edition.

Price per copy, 30 cents sent postpaid upon receipt of price by M. Harman, 507 Carroll Avenue, Chicago.

THE BALLAD OF READING JAIL. BY C. 3.3.

This powerful poem of more than 600 lines, is the work of OSCAR WILDE C. 3. 3. having been the poets prison number during his confinement in Reading Jail. It is dedicated to the memory of a trooper of the Horse Guards who was hanged in the jail at that time, and it depicts the terrible sensations of the author and his fellow prisoners before and after the execution.

Just issued; price, in cloth, blue, vellum back, beautifully printed from large type on hand-made antique paper, deckle edges; reading matter on one side of the paper; a sumptuous book of 96 pages, 7 inches by 5.¼. RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 386 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

WHAT THE YOUNG NEED TO KNOW. A primer of Sexual Rationalism, by E. C. Walker. A valuable compendium on Sex Ethics. Startling and scientific Price, 10 cents.

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 25 cents per dozen.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer. A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

Thinking and Obeying.

"Captain, what do you think," I asked,
"Of the part your soldiers play?"
The captain answered: "I do not think—
I do not think—I obey."

"Do you think you should shoot a patriot down
And help a tyrant slay?"
The captain answered, "I do not think—
I do not think—I obey."

"Do you think that your conscience was meant to die
And your brains to rot away?"
The captain answered, "I do not think—
I do not think—I obey."

"Then if this is your soldier's code," I cried,
"You're a mean, unmanly crew,
And with all your feathers and gilt and braid
I am more of a man than you."

"For whatever my lot on earth may be,
And whether I swim or sink,
I can say with pride, "I do not obey—
I do not obey—I think!

"Elective Affinities."

"Have you ever read Goethe's 'Elective Affinities'?" I was asked a short time ago. On replying that I had not, I was assured I should do so, and was presented with a copy of the work. I was so much interested in it that I immediately felt impelled to pass the recommendation on to the readers of Lucifer.

Goethe wrote "Elective Affinities" in 1809. The "Encyclopedia Brittanica" says it is "a story which is always cited to prove the immorality of his works. A married couple, Edward and Charlotte, are thrown into constant companionship with two unmarried persons, the Captain and Ottilie. A cross attraction takes place similar to that which is often seen in chemical experiments. Edward unites himself with Ottilie, Charlotte with the Captain. The psychological changes by which this result is reached is portrayed with a masterly hand. . . . . The work is replete with earnest purpose and terrible warning."

The "warning" can be called so only in the sense that the life of any one who does not conform to the rulings of the mob may be called a warning. In that sense Lovejoy's life and death was a "warning" to others to refrain from criticisms of the "sacred institution" of slavery; "The Woman Who Did" was a "warning" to those who ignore the "sacred institution" of marriage. Actually, however, the story of "Elective Affinities" should be a "warning" to those who seek to regulate the lives of others. All four of the persons immediately concerned were good, lovable characters. They were friends of long standing, and remained good friends, regardless of the counter attractions. Had it not been for the wrongly developed "social conscience," they might have lived happy, helpful lives.

The following is taken from the book: L. H.

Charlotte laid her work aside, promising the fullest attention.

The captain began:

"In all natural objects with which we are acquainted, we observe immediately that they have a certain relation to themselves. It may sound ridiculous to be asserting what is obvious to every one; but it is only by coming to a clear understanding together about what we know, that we can advance to what we do not know."

"I think," interrupted Edward, "we can help the thing more clear to her and to ourselves with examples. Conceive water or oil or quicksilver: among these you will see a certain oneness, a certain connection of their parts; and this oneness is never lost, except through force or some other determining cause. Let the cause cease to operate, and at once the parts unite again."

"Unquestionably," said Charlotte, "that is plain: raindrops readily unite and form streams; and, when we were children, it was our delight to play with quicksilver, and wonder at the little globules splitting and parting, and running into one another."

"And here," said the captain, "let me just cursorily mention one remarkable thing: I mean, that the full, complete correlation of parts, which the fluid state makes possible, shows itself distinctly and universally in the globular form. The falling water-drop is round; you yourself spoke of the globules of quicksilver; and a drop of melted lead let fall, if it has time to harden before it reaches the ground, is found at the bottom in the shape of a ball."

"Let me try and see," said Charlotte, "whether I can understand where you are bringing me. As everything has a reference to itself, so it must have some relation to others."

"And that," interrupted Edward, "will be different according to the natural differences of the things themselves. Sometimes they will meet like friends and old acquaintances: they will come rapidly together, and unite without either having to alter itself at all—as wine mixes itself with water. Others, again, will remain as strangers, side by side; and no amount o mechanical mixing or forcing will succeed in combining them. Oil and water may be shaken up together; and the next moment they are separate again, each by itself."

"One can almost fancy," said Charlotte, "that in these simple forms one sees people that one is acquainted with; one has met with just such things in the societies amongst which one has lived; and the strangest likenesses of all with these soulless creatures, are in the masses in which men stand divided one against the other, in their classes and professions—the nobility and the third estate, for instance, or soldiers and civilians."

"Then again," replied Edward, "as these are united together under common laws and customs, so there are immediate members in our chemical world, which will combine elements that are mutually repulsive."

"Oh, for instance, said the captain, "we make combine with water with the help of alkalies"——

"Do not go too fast with your lesson," said Charlotte. "Let me see that I keep step with you. Are we not here arrived among the affinities?"

"Exactly," replied the captain: "we are on the point of apprehending them in all their power and distinctness; such natures as, when they come in contact, at once lay hold of each other, and mutually affect one another, we speak of as having an affinity one for the other. With the alkalies and acids, for instance, the affinities are strikingly marked. They are of opposite natures: very likely their being of opposite natures is the secret of their effect on one another—they seek one another eagerly out, lay hold of each other, modify each other's character, and form in connection an entirely new substance. There is lime, you remember, which shows the strongest inclination for all sorts of acids—a distinct desire of combining with them."

"It appears to me," said Charlotte, "that, if you choose to call these strange creatures of yours related, the relationship is not so much a relationship of blood, as of soul or of spirit. It is the way in which we see all genuinely deep friendships arise among men: opposite peculiarities of disposition being what best makes internal union possible. But I will wait to see what you can really show me of these mysterious proceedings; and for the present," she added, turning to Edward, "I will promise not to disturb you any more in your reading. You have taught me enough of what it is about to enable me to attend to it."

"No, no," replied Edward, "now that you have once stirred the thing, you shall not get off so easily. It is just the most complicated cases which are the most interesting. In these you come first to see the degrees of the affinities, to watch them as their power of attraction is weaker or stronger, nearer or more remote. Affinities only begin really to interest when they bring about separations."

"What!" cried Charlotte, "is that miserable word which unhappily we hear so often nowadays in the world,—is that to be found in nature's lessons too?"

"Most certainly," answered Edward: "the title with which chemists were supposed to be most honorably distinguished was, artists of separation."

"It is not so any more," replied Charlotte; and it is well that it is not. Uniting is a higher art, and it is a higher merit. An artist of union is what we should welcome in every province of the universe. However, as we are on the subject again, give me an instance or two of what you mean."

"We had better keep," said the captain, "to the same instances of which we have already been speaking. Thus, what we call limestone is a more or less pure calcareous earth in combination with a delicate acid, which is familiar to us in the form of a gas. Now, if we place a piece of this stone in diluted sulphuric acid, this will take possession of the lime, and appear with it in the form of gypsum, the gaseous acid at the same time going off in vapor. Here is a case of separation; a combination arises, and we believe ourselves now justified in applying to in to it the words "elective affinity;" it really looks as if one relation had been deliberately chosen in preference to another."

"Forgive me," said Charlotte, "as I forgive the natural philosopher. I cannot see any choice in this: I see a natural necessity rather, and scarcely that. After all, it is, perhaps, merely a case of opportunity. Opportunity makes relations as it makes thieves; and, as long as the talk is only of natural substances, the choice appears to me to be altogether in the hands of the chemist who brings the creatures together. Once, however, let them be brought together, and then God have mercy on them. In the present case, I cannot help being sorry for the poor acid gas, which is driven out up and down infinity again."

"The acid's business," answered the captain," is now to get connected with water, and so serve as a mineral fountain for the refreshing of both the healthy and sick."

"That is very well for the gypsum to say," said Charlotte. "The gypsum is all right, is a body, is provided for. The other poor, desolate creature may have trouble enough to go through before it can find a second home for itself."

"I am much mistaken," said Edward, smiling, if there be not some little arriere pensee behind this. Confess your wickedness! You mean me by your lime: the lime is laid hold of by the captain, in the form of sulphuric acid, torn away from your agreeable society, and metamorphosed into a refractory GYPsum."

"If your conscience prompts you to make such a reflection," replied Charlotte, "I certainly need not distress myself. Those comparisons are pleasant and entertaining; and who is there that does not like playing with analogies? But man is raised very many steps above these elements; and, if he has been somewhat liberal with such fine words as 'election' and 'elective affinities, he will do well to turn back again into himself, and take the opportunity of considering carefully the value and meaning of such expressions. Unhappily, we know cases enough where an apparently indissoluble connection between two persons has, by the accidental introduction of a third, been utterly destroyed, and one or the other of the once happily united pair been driven out into the wilderness."

"Then, you see how much more gallant the chemists are," said Edward, "They at once add a fourth, that neither may go away empty."

"Quite so," replied the captain. "And these are the cases which are really most important and remarkable,—cases where this attraction, this affinity, this separating and combining, can be exhibited, the two pairs severally crossing each other; when four creatures, connected previously, as two and two, are brought into contact, and at once forsake their first combination to form into a second. In this forsaking and embracing, this seeking and flying, we believe that we are indeed observing the effects of some higher determination: we attribute a sort of will and choice to such creatures, and feel really justified in using technical words, and speaking of 'elective affinities'."

The World Moves.

In reading the history of Henry IV. of France, the leader of the Huguenots, by John S. C. Abbott, I found the following that I think worthy a prominent place in your most admirable paper and quite apropos of these times of severe struggle for freedom in all things, of which you and your daughter are valiant, worthy, and intelligent leaders:

"Let us inscribe upon the arch which spans our glorious Union, making us one celestial embrace, 'Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and free men.'

"The human mind is now roused that it will have this liberty, and if there are any institutions of religion or of civil law which cannot stand this scrutiny, they are doomed to die."

JAY CHAAPEL.

England's Premier on Rational Dress.

Lord Salisbury denounced dress reform in strong terms at the recent Royal Academy banquet. He regards cycling skirts for women as most ungraceful, and relegated them to a place both low and warm. Lady Habberton wittily retorts:

"But let the members of the Rational Dress League take heart, for when we consider the popular pictures of the noble Lord himself smothered in greatcoats, and in outline otherwise unlike the Apollo Belvedere, we may be sure that wherever we are, there also will he be. The place to which he would consign us may be warm, but at least it will not be dull, for our witty Premier will be there to cheer us with some of his delightful comments on passing events."

"Isn't It Shocking!"

BY LEONA R. MATHERS.

Alfreda voices my sentiments exactly in "Various Voices," Lucifer No. 762, when she says, "I earnestly wish that all sex radicals who write for Lucifer would make their articles more suitable for propaganda work."

But I cannot agree with her in her reasons for thinking many copies unsuitable for such work. I, too, would be very much pleased to see special editions occasionally prepared for new readers.

My greatest difficulty in using the average copy of Lucifer among new readers is the fact that it is too deep for them. The average man and woman is not far enough advanced in philosophy, literature, or anything else, to understand or become interested in a large majority of the articles published in Lucifer.

Alfreda says: "Is the talismanic phrase free love so dear to the hearts of sex radicals that they will not substitute some name less terrible to the average reader?—some term that will appeal to the reason of all sensible persons and yet not shock their prejudices?"

What more harmless or less shocking term could be used? What is there so terrible or so shocking about the word free, or the word love to any sensible person? And if some other term could or should be used that expressed the same meaning or conveyed the same idea, would it not be equally terrible and shocking?

People who are terrified or shocked at seeing or hearing the words free and love united, would go still further and demand that the name of our Lucifer be changed to something less terrible. They would call a leg a "foot-handle," and blush at seeing a horse without "pants."

Alfreda says: "I know many good women who would gladly learn something concerning the sex problem if it could be presented in a way to make them see that it was really a reform. As it is, we dare not hand out the paper to our neighbor, who is starving for the information it contains, lest she be offended or repelled by the thorough-going manner in which the vitally important subjects are handled."

Well, I must confess I am not so easily shocked as some people. I have been reading Lucifer about ten years, and I have never yet found an article in its columns that could, by the greatest stretch of imagination be taken as the opposite of a reformative character, except by Comstock or persons of his ilk. Comstock and the postal laws will not permit us to be so terribly shocking as we might otherwise become. And I object to throwing away the small fraction of liberty that they do allow us, to please other unofficial prudes. Just such people as those "good women" who are "starving for information on the sex problem," are responsible for the laws made to prevent themselves and others from obtaining that information.

If they were shocked until they were not so easily shocked we would soon be able to obtain most of that much-desired information from our common school physiologies. More shocking is just what they need to bring them to their senses, and get them to use the little brains that their modesty has permitted them to possess or retain.

No, Alfreda, taking free love out of Lucifer would be equivalent to taking God out of the Bible. I would like to see it contain just as much of that subject, and just as plain talks on sexual and social science as Comstock and the postal laws will permit. You cannot teach philosophy by remaining silent as well as by talking about it. Most people will understand plain language more readily than they will unravel parables or solve riddles.

If we should coin a new phrase, term or word to take the place of free love it would be meaningless to them until they had learned its meaning, and then it would be fully as shocking to them as the original.

"The Ladies' Home Journal," or some good Sunday-school paper would be about the most acceptable thing to hand to those "good women" to read; but some of us would rather not see Lucifer converted into a Sunday-school paper, as they are now more plentiful than such papers as Lucifer.

A Fossil School Board.

BY JAY CHAAPEL.

My soul is sick with every day's report
Of wrong or outrage, with which earth is filled.
There is no love in man's obdurate heart;
It does not feel for man: the natural bond
Of brotherhood is severed as the flax
That falls asunder at the touch of fire."

I was reminded this beautiful morning, while the mocking-birds with graceful forms and movements are singing their ununrivalled songs, of the above words of the great poet Cowper, in reading in "The Educational Forum," Chicago, that the school board of Kane, Pennsylvania, (my native State), have promulgated a manifesto that all women teachers in their schools must sign a pledge that they will not receive men's attentions during the terms of their teaching.

Shades of William Penn! What bigots and tyrants, dressed in a little brief authority, still find a place in Pennsylvania school boards! It sometimes seems as though our chronological tables are all wrong; that we are living in the fourteenth century instead of the nineteenth—near the twentieth. Certainly an order like the above bears about the same relation to the teachings of Spencer, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Horace Mann, and Hugo as a monastery of mediæval monks bears to the late addresses of my friend Benjamin Fay Mills in Hollis Street Theater, Boston.

Is this an age of science or stupid tyranny? Do those would-be saints composing that school-board suppose in their fourteenth century ignorance that the virtue and purity of women intelligent and wise enough to instruct their children, can be enhanced by their edict endeavoring to prevent those teachers associating with whom they please? If so they are in a more pitiable condition than most of the sinners.

Who Wants a Boy?

The following pathetic appeal appears in "Free Society." Perhaps a home for the child may be found among the readers of Lucifer:

"Being afflicted with an incurable disease I am compelled to separate from my child, a bright, healthy boy, seven years of age, who has no mother and whose father has "no home." Now, as an Anarchist, I would like to see my child raised in a liberty-loving family where he may become a useful member of the coming generation, and if there is any comrade who has the means and desire to raise a child, he or she will please communicate for further information with H. H. MILLER.

The Difference.

Mynherr Wilhelm Sappy married Fraulein Lizzie Nappy, a maiden very scrappy, full of fight,
And since then it is related that this pair so badly mated, have a fine old row created every night.

All day long they are busy, are Wilhelm and his Lizzie, but at night they'd make you dizzy with their tongues.
There'll be curse and crimination in a Dutch accentuation till you're lost in admiration of their lungs.

But last night as they were sitting by the fire the thought went flitting through her mind they'd best be quitting of their strife.
And after much reflection on all matters in connection with the move, in deep dejection said the wife:

"Now Vilhelm, vas I admire is dat dog und cat Mariar vat can sit down by der fire vidout a spat.
Dey sit down nice und kviet, and dey neffer raise a riot. Now, vy can't we two try it yoost like dat?"

"Yaw," said he in rising ire, "dat same dog und cat Mariar may sit kviet by der fire—dat's all right;
But mine frau, I dink you bedder yoost to tie dem two tergedder like ve are und den see vedder dey von't fight!"

European Representative, William Duff, 9 Carfin St., Glasgow Scotland.

The name LUCIFER means LIGHT-BRINGING or LIGHT-BEARING and the paper that has adopted this name stands for Light against Darkness—for Reason against Superstition—for Science against Tradition—for Investigation and Enlightenment against Credulity and Ignorance—for Liberty against Slavery—for Justice against Privilege.

Published weekly. One dollar per year. Three months twenty-five cents

Somewhat Personal.

Responding to the invitation in last issue some thirty or more of Lucifer's Chicago friends called during the day and evening of Sunday last, to shake the hand of the editor returning from his five months absence in search of health. Friends who have not yet seen him will be glad to learn that his health has improved decidedly, though he is yet not at all strong. Merely to look at and talk with him he seems in nearly as good health as his average for the past ten years. The principal apparent difference is that he cannot endure as much exertion, mental or physical, as was his wont up to last autumn.

We think this location much better for him than was the house on Congress Street. We have here large sunny bow-windowed rooms facing the south, in which he spends his time while indoors. A considerable portion of each day is spent by him in Union Park, which is only two blocks distant. If he can resist the temptation to over-exert himself, there is no good reason why we may not have him at the head of Lucifer for the next twenty years.

In this connection I must add a few words about my friend M. Florence Johnson, who has aided very materially in the work on Lucifer during the editor's absence. At the time of his departure he expected to be absent not longer than till April, and Mrs. Johnson thought she could spare us a considerable portion of her time until his return. She remained with me until about three weeks ago, when the calls from the East became so imperative that it seemed necessary for her to go. No one who has not enjoyed the companionship of an entirely congenial friend can understand how helpful even the mere presence of such a friend can be.

Besides being a well-balanced, capable, "all-around" woman in private life, Mrs. Johnson is, I think, the best teacher I ever knew. She makes her explanations so clear, and she has the happy faculty of being able to say "the right thing in the right place." As a public reader and speaker she ranks first class, and those contemplating engaging a speaker on radical or freethought subjects, or an entertainer who can give either a radical or popular entertainment, should communicate with her. At present her address is 17 W. 99 St., New York. Letters addressed to her in care of Lucifer office will always reach her.

Few there are, if any, who, having once heard her, do not wish to hear her again. While in Chicago she taught classes in voice culture and physical culture, delivered several lectures and gave a number of entertainments. The last time her Chicago friends had an opportunity to hear her was at a very pleasant farewell meeting at our home a few evenings before her departure.

She may return to the west next winter. We want her, but her eastern friends do not like to let her go. Nevertheless, it would be well for those who desire her services to communicate with her early. I earnestly hope that the call to the West will be strong enough to bring her. L. H.

THIS OFFICE is in receipt of No. 1 of "Free Society Library," entitled, "The Chicago Martyrs,—the Famous Speeches of the Eight Anarchists in Judge Gary's Court, and Altgeld's Reasons for Pardoning Fielden, Neebe, and Schwab." Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Recognition and Reward for Motherhood.

"Quote fair, if you quote at all," is an excellent motto. While agreeing with most that is said in this issue by Friend Brinkerhoff I think it would have been much better if he had quoted the paragraph entire, of which he gave to his readers only a fragment. To show that my meaning was very inadequately presented in the fragment quoted I herewith insert the whole paragraph as given in the Hammond letter:

"And while self-ownership is woman's first and supreme demand it is not her only demand. In order that self-ownership may be everywhere practicable woman demands a thorough reconstruction of our industrial and economic systems. She demands that the wage-slave system be abolished, and that in its stead a system of equitable co-operation and of equal right to the advantages conferred by labor-saving invention, be everywhere inaugurated. She demands that the claims of motherhood, that is, that woman's labor and time while devoted to the work of race-building and care of infant children should receive due recognition, due reward, as the most important of all human industries."

I think our readers must see that in the lines omitted by Mr. Brinkerhoff is contained the answer to his question, "What change does he contemplate?"

The change contemplated is the abolition of the wage-slave system and the substitution therefor of a system of equitable co-operation. Equitable co-operation is impossible so long as we are ruled by the "money trust," that is, so long as governmental money commands or usurps the right of way over all other forms of material wealth. It is this trust, this monopoly, in conjunction with, in conspiracy with, the marriage trust that now makes motherhood and womanhood articles of commerce—things to be bought and sold in the market as though they were stocks and bonds, or bushels of wheat and corn in the "grain pit" of the Board of Trade.

"Recognition." Equitable co-operation would mean that woman, by right of her office as race-builder, as conservator of the life of the race, should be queen of the home, not queen of man's home but queen of her own home. It would mean a reversal of the old Jewish law that permitted a man to send his wife out of his house if she failed to "find favor in his eyes." It would mean that before woman takes upon herself the dread responsibility of bringing another human being into this monopoly-cursed world she must be the absolute ruler and owner of a home,—or be an equal partner with other women in a co-operative home—a home of which she cannot be dispossessed by the sheriff for debt or for non-payment of taxes. A home in which man, or men, would remain during good behavior, or until they failed to find favor in the eyes of the woman or the women who own and rule the home.

"Reward." Not in the narrow sense, not in the commercial nor mercenary sense, were the words "recognition and reward" used in the Hammond letter to which our friend refers. There is an old proverb which says, "Virtue is its own reward." Under normal conditions, that is, under equitable co-operation, maternity—child-building—would be its own reward. When womanhood comes into its rightful inheritance woman will seek motherhood because she herself wants a child, not because she wants to bear a child for some man, nor because she wants to increase the census for the use of the state, the nation, or even to keep the race itself from dying out. She need not, and probably would not consciously think of her altruistic duties at all, and yet it is doubtless true that the instinct of race-preservation lies at the very bottom of all maternal desires and yearnings.

Supply and demand. No demand for heirs. "Most men would rather do without heirs than pay for them." Yet true; and yet the heirs come along; they come in shoals and squadrons, whether wanted or not. As often stated in these columns one of the very worst results of the working of our present marriage laws, coupled with national prohibition against saving knowledge in regard to regulation of size of families, is the enormous overproduction of children who are not wanted, not called for, either by their fathers or mothers. No one wants a redundant population except the employer of wage slaves, who naturally wants a never failing supply of cheap labor; or the political boss who wants cheap votes; or the clergy who want large congregations of cheaply or poorly endowed (and therefore easily controlled) parishioners; or the ambitious ruler of men who wants cheap soldiers to expand his empire over the earth, or to keep in check the discontented slaves at home.

"Even freedom and a general diffusion of moderate wealth would not raise the price of heirs." Correct again, and rightly too. No libertarian wants motherhood and its product to be commercial commodities, but if it must be so, then let women form a "trust" to limit the output, so as to compel the aforesaid ruling classes to pay higher prices for the commodity.

One chief trouble about this is that, as in the case of labor organizations against combined capital, there are only a few women who feel able to go into the combine and live up to its requirements, and the few who are able would not agree to support the indigent ones till the strike could be successful, hence we cannot blame them when they sell themselves, for life or for a shorter period, to the highest bidder in ready cash, or for a promise of support. Last Sunday's papers of this city mention with apparent approval the marriage of a distinguished Chicago teacher to a notorious gambler who is said to be worth a quarter of a million. The report adds that the "hope of all the lady teachers is that some rich man will, in time, offer them marriage and take them away from the teaching business forever," or words to that effect. The greatest trouble however, is in the abnormal conscience of woman herself, and in the public conscience that raises no effective protest.

"The only true settlement of this difficulty will be found in some system of free exchange." Undoubtedly. Free exchange means equitable co-operation, if it means anything. How this free exchange is to be effected, and what should be man's part in the equitable co-operation, it is to be hoped will receive attention and elaboration in subsequent issues of the Light-Bearer. M. H.

From My Point of View.

BY LILLIAN HARMAN.

It is often said that some one is "looking for trouble." Yet that is an assertion which is not usually meant—people do not believe they are intentionally looking for trouble in the sense of seeking it. It would really seem, however, if we are to judge by the actions of some people, that trouble is one of the most priceless jewels to be found in life—though it is usually trouble for "the other fellow" that they are particularly anxious to find. These people search patiently and earnestly; their eyes are continually looking downward, for they fear that their friend may possibly walk over a precious gem of trouble, without observing it, and with the absence of that trouble some "sweetness and light" may be missed from the life of that friend. Trouble should always be treasured as long as possible, for really good people are known by the troubles they keep, and only very, very bad people have no troubles at all. In fact, trouble may be called the "hall-mark" of virtue.

* * *

I was started on this train of thought by a story I have just heard of an ungrateful woman who not only refuses to look for trouble, but will not recognize it when it is pointed out to her. Her lover, whom she loves and respects, has a very high regard for another woman, and spends a great deal of his time with her. Yet this fact does not disturb the woman who "has a prior claim" to him. She has a friend, a married woman, who is extremely jealous of her husband and makes his life, as well as her own, wretched by her jealousy. The jealous wife continually points out the things which in her opinion should trouble the free woman, and the latter only laughs at them. The jealous wife would gladly share the pangs of jealousy with her friend, and yet her friend will not be troubled with jealousy.

Sad, is'nt it? to think how we neglect our opportunities, and are happy when we might just as easily enjoy unlimited misery!

* * *

This reminds me of another story. I was visiting relatives in the "backwoods" of Missouri when I made the acquaintance of a little woman who was divorced from her husband. She was living with her two small children partly supporting them by sewing, her ex husband also contributing to their support. Her married life had not been happy. She and her husband did not agree in the management of the children and the household; he drank, and the wife and children actually suffered for the necessities of life. After the divorce he quit drinking, and really gave his family more money than when they were living together. Removed from the clashings and irritations of daily association they became excellent friends. But the "social conscience" of the small community in which she lived was shocked because she accepted money from a man who was not her husband. No decent woman, the people said, would let a man give her money unless she lived with him in honorable marriage. Her friends reported to her all that the gossips said, and made her life so uncomfortable that she felt herself obliged to marry him again. If her friends had not been so assiduous in their search for trouble for her, she might have continued to live in peace; but no—her friends would have been derelict in their duty, they would have said, if they failed to point out to her all the troubles which she might enjoy.

The "old" man thought it beneath his dignity to do "woman's work". The little lad who helped his sister and mother was called "Sissy-boy," and regarded with contempt by his small masculine associates. The "new" man is different. If his sister or sweetheart is working in the kitchen and he wants to talk to her, he would be ashamed to sit idly by, watching her work—he is both willing and able to help her.

There is a man down in Texas who is "new" in this readiness to do house work, whether he is "new" in any other sense or not; and he has got himself into trouble thereby. His name is Henry Bunch, and he lived at Angleton, Brazoria County. He had an invalid wife. In the morning he cooked her food, then went to his daily work on the railroad section, and at night washed the dishes and cleaned the house. On Sunday he washed the clothes and hung them out to dry; then went to work in his garden.

The good people of Angleton were quite shocked by the sight of clean clothes hanging on the line as they passed by to church, so they had Bunch arrested. He was tried, found guilty of working on Sunday, and fined $10 and costs of $28.35. He refused to take the pauper's oath, and being unable to pay was sent to jail. The wife and baby were left helpless, and the small sum due from the railroad was used to send them to her parents in Bastrop. The latter place is the home of Governor Sayres, and he is to be asked to "pardon" Bunch, who, the newspaper reports say is a "hard-working, sober, inoffensive man." We are not told who is to be asked to pardon the people who had a a man sent to prison for trying to furnish food and clean clothing for a sick woman and helpless baby.

Lovering B. Silver.

A Cleveland friend sends us a clipping from a daily paper of the passing away of "Lovering B. Silver, one of Cleveland's oldest and best citizens," on the fourteenth day of last month. From this statement we learn that the immediate cause of death to this distinguished Freethinker was an injury received from a fall, in April last.

The reporter says, "The deceased was conscious up to within a few minutes of the end and told those about him that he died as he had lived, an unbeliever in the Christian faith. His death was not attended with any great suffering."

It was the privilege of the writer of these lines to know Mr. Silver personally, having visited him several times, by invitation, at his home on Summit street, and having been while there the recipient of many favors, among which were several delightful drives through the principal streets of the "Forest City." He was for some years a reader and generous patron of the Light-Bearer.

Long will the memory of Lovering B. Silver be kept green by those who knew him best, and who loved him for his many virtues and for his noble and honorable life. M. H.

Woman Church and State.

It is only by contrasting present conditions with past ones that we realize the vast improvement the race is undergoing, and especially the female portion of it. I wish every reader of Lucifer could possess Mrs. Joslyn Gage's great work, "Woman, Church and State." I've never seen a book to equal it in its picturing of the wrongs and abuses, and horrors woman has been compelled to undergo, and very many of these are still extant.

I will give a few extracts from the book, as these facts cannot be too well known. A wrong, once known to be wrong, is on the way of being redressed.

"Under Canon Law a woman could not be witness in ecclesiastical or criminal suits, nor attest a will. To cast doubts on a person's word is indicative of the most supreme contempt, imparting discredit to the whole character. That a woman could not attest a will, nor become a witness in ecclesiastical suits, implied great degradation, and is a very strong proof of the low esteem in which woman was held by both state and church.

"In order to keep the ranks of the church full, the bearing of children was enforced upon women as a religious duty. No condition of health or distaste for motherhood was admitted as exemption.

"Alike from the altar, the confessional, and at the marital ceremony, was the duty taught, nor has such instruction, even under the light of philosophy and new regard for personal rights, yet ceased. The clergy formerly, and to this very day, declare those women evil who desire to limit self-indulgence and procreation. . . .

"While under the old Common Law a husband was compelled to leave to his wife one-third of his property, and could leave her as much more as he pleased, by Canon Law he was prohibited from leaving her more than one-third and could leave her as much less as he pleased. Thus ecclesiasticism presumed to control a husband's affections, and placing its slimy fingers upon common law, allowed the husband to leave his wife in absolute poverty, notwithstanding that her property upon marriage, and her services under marriage belonged exclusively to him.

"It is less than fifty years since the dockets of a court in New York City, the great metropolis of the United States, were sullied by the suit of husband against parties who had harbored and sheltered his wife after she left him, the husband recovering $1,000 damages.

"Women were taught both by church and state, that the feudal lord had a right to them, not only as against themselves but as against any claim of husband or father. The custom known by a variety of names as 'Marchetta' or 'Marquete,' compelled newly married women to a most dishonorable servitude. They were regarded as the rightful prey of the feudal lord from one to three days after their marriage, and from this custom the oldest son of the serf was held as the son of the lord, as perchance it was he who begot him. During the feudal period bearing children was the duty pre-eminently taught to women.

"Serf children increased the power and possessions of the lord, and they also added to the power of the church.

"Woman was taught that sensual submission to man, and the bearing of children, were the two reasons for her having been created, and that the woman who failed in either had no excuse for longer encumbering the earth."

Think not, friends, that these old-time wrongs are righted even yet. But work on, strive on, and persevere, for step by step we are going onwards and upwards towards right and justice.

Out of the balk, the morbid and the shallow,
Out of the bad majority,
The various countless frauds of men and states,
Elective, antiseptic, yet cleaving, suffusing all—
Only the good is universal. —Whitman.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

The Mother's Reward.

BY EDGAR D. BRINKERHOFF.

In his letter dated Hammond, La., April 17, the editor broaches a most important subject when he says:

"And while self-ownership is woman's first and supreme demand it is not her only demand. She demands that the claims of motherhood, that is, that woman's labor and time while devoted to the work of race building and care of infant children should receive due recognition, due reward, as the most important of all human industries."

This question of reward is one of the most pressing of all present sexual problems. Society is forcing individuals to live under a system of reward that is inconsistent with justice and progress. To go into the child-bearing business the young woman must allow the state to tie her for life to a man who is required to reward her with "support." The editor does not seem to be satisfied with this arrangement, and yet it cannot be that a libertarian like himself would desire to have society furnish the reward. Then what change does he contemplate?

If, as the editor says, those engaged in the industry of human reproduction and race-building ought to be rewarded for their labor and time, the question arises, Are services to be paid for when there is no demand for them? The editor's individualism requires him to answer, No. Now, fairly, is there any general demand for heirs or for the service of furnishing them and caring for them? Certainly not. Heirs are more frequently unwelcome than desired. Most men would rather do without heirs than pay for them. They are regarded as a necessary evil. Even freedom and a general diffusion of moderate wealth would not raise the price of heirs.

If child raising is to stand on its own legs as other industries do, it must furnish an article that men are willing to buy. So long as women persist in refusing to put on the market a product or service for which there is demand they will have themselves to blame if they fail of support or reward. Progress along the lines of freedom requires that women be supported voluntarily, not out of state funds nor out of the private funds of men under a state-enforced marriage system. Even voluntary support furnished by charitable associations would not be an ideal system, as the child-raising industry to be healthy must be self-supporting.

The only true settlement of this difficulty will be found in some system of free exchange.

VARIOUS VOICES.

W. A. Wotherspoon, Denver, Colo.—Enclosed find $1.15. Credit me one dollar on subscription, and send me Austin Kent's pamphlet on "Free Love" for fifteen cents. Lucifer is one of our necessities. Lillian has ably maintained the high standard of excellence of our paper during your absence. This is gratifying to us, as it must be to you, for we all know now that when in the course of time you are sentenced by Judge Nature to retire from the active management of our "Morning Star" its light will not grow dim, but will increase in brilliancy as the years go by.

Fannie M. Taylor, Ft. Smith, Ark.:—I consider that you are my friend and a friend to the whole human family, for you are doing what you can for the betterment of the human race. I have been receiving Lucifer for a long time sent to my father-in-law's address. He is dead, and you may change it to my address. He thought as I think, that Lucifer is a grand paper and is doing a vast amount of good work. After I have read each number I pass it on for someone else to read. I don't want to miss a copy of it. I have just finished reading No. 764. Hope your father's health will be better after his trip. I like to see women interested in dress reform. There are a great many women who would be glad to dress differently, but who haven't the courage to "go it alone." Enclosed find thirty cents for which please send the inclosed list of pamphlets.

A. C., Iowa:—My subscription to Lucifer expired with the last issue. I was intending to renew several weeks ago and had a paper bill reserved for that purpose, but neglected sending it from week to week, and now I am bankrupt, and as I expect to remain nearly bankrupt for some time to come, I'm going to ask you to discontinue my paper. I'm thinking of earning my own living now, and as I don't expect to earn much at first I shall have to curtail my expenses. Lucifer has been to me a very helpful friend; it came into my life with a mission, and though it seems necessary for us to part for the present, I'm in hopes that sometime in the future we may renew our acquaintance.

I have been having some terrible experiences recently. I've not only been robbed—divested of a number of greenbacks I had laid away (hid but he found "'em") and outraged, and that by the man who calls me wife, and who has always claimed to love me (a common type of love), a man who has been a church official nearly all his lifetime and a very model Christian. He didn't know, I'm sure, how big his personal devil within himself had grown until I tested him by refusing absolutely to submit. He certainly has evidence now that religion hasn't crowded his devil into a back seat, but that he sat on the front row all the time waiting a chance to demonstrate his presence. Yes, I refused to submit, and the consequences were awful. No wife dreams of the tyrannical power she is under until she begins to assert her selfhood—to follow her own desires instead of weakly submitting to the desires of a husband. To be a wife in the old sense of the term is simply to be a thing, a poor, animated thing, divested of every element of true womanhood. The wife—the slave and the tool—must take leave else the woman will never arrive, and how I long for her coming. I'm loving her at this moment, and glorying in the very thought of her. O, woman! as I behold you with mental vision my heart within me leaps for joy. The individualized woman! When she in all her intellectual strength, her infinite loving capacity, purity and tenderness shall arrive, heaven itself will have come to men. All else awaits her coming. So adieu to the wife and welcome to woman. . . I've read on advanced lines of thought for several years, though I had never seen a sex reform paper until Lucifer came to me. When it came the soil was prepared and ready for its planting. As I have said, it came with a mission, and I'm more of a woman because of its mission fulfilled. In its columns I find much, very much expressed concerning love that doesn't at all meet my ideal, but that is to be expected where such a variety of opinions is expressed. Men and women are reaching toward the ideal, but few there are at present who have reached very high. But each must express himself and live on his own plane of unfoldment, and so I've no fault to find with any. I've signed my name as usual, but I'm going to drop the name "——" and take my maiden name.

I. Jameson, Brinnon, Wash.—I wish I could report good progress on our Free Home Colony, but if we can't induce free men and women to come to the rugged shores of Hood's Canal to build a home we'll try to trade our homestead for land in Lake Bay vicinity. For if the colony won't come to us we'll have to go to it. Home City comes nearest to my ideal of a free colony of any I am acquainted with. I must thank our dear sister Lillian for continuing Lucifer's weekly visits to our Home, as well as for so ably editing it in the absence of her noble father. I, too, have been much interested in his letters during his southern tour. I had hoped that he might visit Sea Breeze, Fla., and meet Dr. E. B. Dayton, a noble-hearted, whole-souled old friend of ours. . . .

I see in Lucifer, No. 762, notice that Austin Kent's book, "Free Love," was published in 1875, which I think is an error. I think he died prior to that date. I think he published the book either before or during the war of the rebellion. I received a few copies of it in 1867 from my friend Otis C. Hall in Pekin, N. Y., who was the author's warm friend. He requested me to sell them at fifty cents each and send the proceeds to Kent, as he was a cripple and in close circumstances, and I did so when I could find a buyer. But in those days people interested in that subject were very much fewer than now. The air is fragrant with freedom now and it bids my old heart and head rejoice to sniff the breeze. Where is my old comrade, Delos Dunton? We were intimate friends in '65-'66 in Pekin, N. Y., and we sojourned a couple of months at his communal home in Carpentersville, Ill., in the fall of '67. Write me, Bro. Delos, and tell us how your Home prospers. I have never for a moment abandoned the hope of succeeding in establishing a permanent communal or co-operative home. Now dear friends, one and all, let us see to it that Lucifer keeps on shining brighter and brighter until she outshines the sun. Don't let her light grow dim for lack of the "In God we trust" $.

[The book which we advertise "published in '75," is a second edition. We do not know when the first edition was published. Delos Dunton lives in Carpentersville, Ill. He has not lost faith in progress and is a very helpful friend of Lucifer as well as of other workers in the field of reform. "We are reformers in spring and summer," says Emerson. "In autumn and winter we stand by the old. Reformers in the morning; conservatives at night." This is true in too many instances; but fortunately it is not true of Delos Dunton in the autumn of his life. And when winter comes to him, I doubt if it will find him changed. L. H.]

Personal Rights and Sexual Wrongs.

Women in Marriage Slavery

Will find in HILDA'S HOME a story exposing the horrors of their condition as faithfully and as fearlessly as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" exposed the horrors of Negro slavery in the South. The story is more entertaining than many modern works of fiction and the plain truths it tells will find responsive echoes in the aching, bursting hearts of many women who know the galling effects of marriage thralldom.

The book contains 425 pages. Price handsomely bound in cloth, $1. In paper cover 50 cents. Send in your order NOW—especially if you want extra copies for distribution among your friends.

THE SOCIAL QUESTION. A discussion between Juliet H. Severance and David Jones. The opposing principles are herein stated clearly and briefly. Valuable to those who want to possess the arguments of both sides of the question. Price 15 cents. "Life and Health, or How to Live a Century," by the same author. Price, 10 cents. "A Lecture on Religious, Political and Social Freedom." Price, 5 cents. A set, one of each, for 25 cents.

Government Analyzed. By John H. Kelso. The chapter headings are: "Derivations and Definitions of Political Terms; Various Forms of Government; General Principles of Government; Functions of Government; Origin of Government; Declaration of Independence; Articles of Confederation; Defects of the Confederation; Formation of the Constitution of the United States; Constitution of the United States; Taxation; Tariff or Protection; War; Punishments; Marriage; Religion; Prohibition; Money; What a Government Should Be." 320 pages. Price reduced to $1.00.

Health Hints and ready recipes. Dr. E. B. Foote's time-tried hand book, comprising information of the utmost importance to everybody, concerning their daily habits, together with many useful suggestions for the management of various diseases; recipes for relief of common ailments, including some of the private formula of Dr. Foote, and directions for preparation of delicacies for invalids as pursued in the best hospitals of this country and Europe. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"Loma"—A CITIZEN OF VENUS," by Prof. Wm Windsor. A story of surpassing interest, largely devoted to Sexologic and Sociologic problems. Like Bellamy in his "Looking Backward," the writer of "Loma" believes in the "state," as a factor in social evolution, but individualists will probably forgive this feature for the sake of the radically revolutionary ideas in regard to popular theories—sexologic, theologic, cosmologic, etc. Substantially printed and artistically bound. Price, post-paid, $1.50. Address this office.

Songs of the Unblind Cupid.

Under the title "Songs of the Unblind Cupid," an edition de luxe, in red and black, of a few hitherto unpublished poems by the liberal poet, J. Wm. Lloyd, is just issued.

The verses are printed from Kelmscott type upon deckle-edged, hand-made paper of cerulean tint. Covers brown, with choice of silver or gold lettering. Initial letters, ornaments and borders are in red, and an initial letter and sketch upon the opening page are hand painted in water colors.

Mr. Lloyd, as author of "Wind Harp Songs" and the "Red Heart in a White World," needs no introduction to the liberal public. These few new poems of love, liberty and nature are here preserved in the highest style of the printers' art, and should find a place in the collection of every friend of freedom, every lover of poetry and every admirer of choice and dainty publications.

Edition limited to 650 copies. There will be no second edition.

Price per copy, 35 cents. Sent postpaid upon receipt of price by M. Harman, 507 Carroll Avenue, Chicago.

THE BALLAD OF READING JAIL. BY C. 3.3.

This powerful poem of more than 600 lines, is the work of OSCAR WILDE C. 3. 3. having been the poets prison number during his confinement in Reading Jail. It is dedicated to the memory of a trooper of the Horse Guards who was hanged in the jail at that time, and it depicts the terrible sensations of the author and his fellow prisoners before and after the execution.

Just issued; price, in cloth, blue, vellum back, beautifully printed from large type on hand-made antique paper, deckle edges; reading matter on one side of the paper; a sumptuous book of 96 pages, 7 inches by 5, $1. RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE SEXUAL RELATIONS,

By Karl Heinzen. A new edition together with the startling letters of Louise Mayer" on Men and Women, and a report of the Convention of German women at Frauenstadt. A book of 286 pages, handsomely printed on good paper. It is more than twice the size of the original edition of "Rights of Women" alone and yet is sold at a lower price. Heinzen's great book is destined to become a classic and is sure to open the eyes of those who think women have their rights already. Its price is so low that every reader of this advertisement can afford to buy it, and no better book can be found to interest those who heretofore have given little or no thought to the necessity for the emancipation of women from ownership by men. Price paper bound, 50 cents; cloth, $1

LOVE AND THE LAW. By E. C. Walker. A clear, concise statement of social liberty in contradistinction to the much lauded legal bondage now almost universally upheld. An excellent missionary document. Two copies, 5 cents; 30 cer ts per dozen.

The Outcome of Legitimation. By Oswald Dawson. This address was to have appeared in the January "Adult," but the printers of that number played Bowdler on a small scale, and refused to print it, alleging that the matter which they did print was "bad enough, but we are printing that and decline to print more." The lecture deals with some problems arising from the practicalization of the theories of free love. Price, 5 cents. For sale at this office.

The Sanctity of Marriage. As viewed from a moral and sanitary standpoint. A solemn protest against the present demoralizing management of that institution. Its effects upon offspring and its influence upon education. By Dr. Robert A. Greer, A valuable "opening wedge" in missionary work. Price reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents, for sale at this office.

My Philosophy.

I saw good men at strife because a creed
That half held sacred, half had learned to shun;
And while their bodies rotted in the sun
I thought;—I thought of all the strength we need

To war with nature;—how men's interests, freed
From misconception, still must ever run
Athwart; and ere my pondering was done
I heard from lips of wounds that seemed to plead,—

"Teach fact and judge not. Let the world have light,
Show all to all, that all men's eyes may see
The best and worst; that, stamped on all men's sight,
Some sharp, some dull, the self-same star may be.
The guide for all. Facts and not creeds unite."—
Which forms the whole of my philosophy.

Irene, of Constantinople.

BY C. L. JAMES.

Towards the end of the eighth Christian century a great readjustment of European affairs was evidently impending. The Western Roman Empire had for four hundred years been a mere name; all actual power being divided among petty princes of Frankish or Gothic origin; who still, however, attributed their regal position to a recognition of this accomplished fact bestowed on their ancestors by the distant court of Constantinople. But this fiction had come to be past keeping up. The Eastern Empire, two hundred and fifty years earlier, was still by far the greatest power in the world. Under Justinian and Theodora it had subdued the Goths of Italy and the Vandals in Africa, contemptuously recognized the independence of the French and Spanish princelings, and exerted itself chiefly to maintain, in conformity with precedent, its Asiatic frontier against the still mighty Sassanides of Persia. Now all was changed. Persia, Africa, and Spain, had been conquered by the Mussulmans. Their fleets, which overspread the Mediterranean, had been repelled from both Rome and Constantinople; but this only proved that the decayed kingdom of Justinian's successors retained, in a few fortresses, enough power to preserve its existence.

Except Rome and some other fortified cities on the coast, all Italy had fallen under the barbarian Lombards, and these conquerors themselves began to regard with awe the increasing power of the Franks, who had recently proved able to cope with the Mahometan armies. The Frankish crown had been bestowed on Pepin by the Pope, whom all western Christians regarded with superstitious devotion; but who, himself a vassal of the Byzantine emperor, chafed at the independence of his brother bishop in Constantinople. The pious feuds of these Christian pastors made Rome desirous to break loose from Constantinople entirely, and Constantinople ready to seize any opportunity for curbing the ambition of Rome.

In 718 A. D., one of those revolutions so common in a purely military state had exalted to the Byzantine throne an obscure soldier, born in the wild robber region of Isauria, who called himself Leo III. For some reason by no means easily extracted from the meager and partial chronicles, he entertained a vehement prejudice against the use of images in religious worship, and attempted to put it down. The result was an open breach between Constantinople and Rome, which accepted the protection of the Lombards, but some years later invoked against their disagreeable patronage the easier yoke of of the more distant Franks. Leo's son and successor, Constantine V. who, in consequence of a most unpleasant and foolish story, is called Copronymus, reigned from 741 to 775 A. D. He was successful in war against the Moslems on the Euphrates and the ever troublesome Slavonic barbarians on the Danube; his reign was a period of commercial prosperity, and witnessed some considerable improvements. But he surpassed his father in zeal against the worship of images. Accordingly the Catholic writers accuse him of inordinate cruelty, and excess in those Grecian vices which confound the nature of sex and species. After making every deduction possible from these libels, it remains true that orthodox monks, generals, and magistrates, suffered from his bigotry the punishment of mutilation, which it must be added, was just as common at Constantinople as in Italy, and for the same reason—both were governed by soldiers of barbarian origin. His eldest son, Leo the Fourth, a person of feeble character, contracted what seems to have been a love match with Irene, a native of Athens, a beautiful but portionless maiden, seventeen years of age. She was driven from the palace upon the discovery that she was secretly addicted to image worship.

We may very naturally attribute the revelation and the punishment to the ambition of Copronymus' sons by a second marriage. But Irene's dominion over her husband remained almost intact; at least from the time he was emperor, it became their first care to secure the succession against Copronymus' other family. Irene and her son, Constantine VI., then but five years old, were crowned during the life of Leo; the most solemn oaths of allegiance to both were exacted from all persons sufficiently important; the first to swear and the first to violate their faith were the five younger sons of Copronymus. They had been defrauded by Leo of a considerable legacy; but his behavior to them in other respects indicates that neither he nor Irene, as yet meditated anything worse than to keep from them the means of doing mischief. They were loaded with honors. Their first conspiracy against Leo, Irene and Constantine, was detected and pardoned. For a second (at Leo's death) they were required to take the vows of priests, which would, it was thought, exclude them from the throne. But a third attempt provoked the rigor of the Byzantine law. The eldest of Leo's half-brothers was blinded, the others were deprived of their tongues; and all were imprisoned.

At the death of Leo, Irene, now mistress of Constantinople had set herself amidst the acclamations of the people, to restore the ancient worship. Finding the Eastern church almost unaniimous in approving, she wrote to the Pope to propose a general council which would give her holy purpose the full weight of Catholic authority. In this memorable letter she addressed him as one of the ecumenical (universal) bishops, and assured him that his compeers were zealous in the good cause. His Holiness gently reproved her language though her offer was far too valuable to be slighted. He wanted her to understand that there was no universal bishop in Christendom but himself. Irene could not depart so far from the traditional policy of Constantinople as to acknowledge this. But since she agreed with the Pope about what was actually to be done, the council materialized 787 A. D. and brought forth the decision that images of holy persons were by all means to be honored. The Empress and the Pope had, however, overrated the actual popularity of image worship. The Greek verb proskuneo or prostypo, by which the honor due to sacred emblems had been defined, was rendered into Latin by adoro. A tremendous storm consequently broke out in France, the very country on which Rome now principally relied. The French bishops headed by Agabard*, protested against the idolatrous expression, and a schism was only prevented by profuse explanations from Rome. In the Eastern Church, the party opposed to images were still strong enough to force a compromise. Pictures, but not statues, it was decided, should be employed to assist devotion. During the dispute the sons of Copronymus were brought forth by the party opposed to Irene and her system. In the cathedral of St. Sophia, the blind one addressed the multitude on behalf of his dumb brothers.

"Countrymen and Christians" he said "behold the sons of your emperor, if you can still recognize their features in this miserable state. A life, an imperfect life, is all the malice of our enemies has spared. It is now threatened" (this appeal how, ever pathetic, was a lie) "and we now throw ourselves on your protection."

A murmur seemed to forbode an outbreak, but a minister, devoted to Irene, averted it by pretending great zeal for her enemies. He tempted them to a place where they were seized and from thence they were shipped to her own city of Athens. A Slavonian officer proposed to release them and lead them again with his troops to Constantinople; but at Athens the people were so proud of Irene and so zealous in her cause that a conspiracy could have no chance of success. All the sons of Copronymus now underwent the politically fatal operation of blinding, while Irene, who must have connived at this severity, threw the blame of it on her over zealous partisans.

Darker scenes were behind. The iconoclasts fixed their hopes on young Constantine, and a conspiracy was formed to set aside his mother, but for whose regency he certainly never could have reigned. He consented that she should be banished to Sicily. But Irene was far too sagacious and vigilant not to foresee and anticipate such designs. The insidious advisers of her son were themselves banished (some of them mutilated) and on him she inflicted a punishment which has usually been considered very proper for a mother to administer, but which must have been sufficiently humiliating for an emperor to suffer. They might probably have been reconciled but for the fatal obstacle of religion. In the mind of Irene, as of many other sovereigns, ambition and orthodoxy had become inseparable objects of devotion and perceiving that she could never trust her son with her own plans, she took the bold step of declaring herself sole ruler, (790 A. D.) There was no precedent for a woman's holding the scepter of the Cæsars in her own name; the army mutinied and Irene, though not deprived of her title, was for a time kept in retirement. But she regained the ascendancy over her son's weak mind, assisted in this, as in all her diplomacy by two very influential bodies of courtiers, the clergy and the eunuchs, both of which were thoroughly devoted to her cause.

(Concluded next week.)

* This ill-treated prelate presents in a dark age the interesting spectacle of a mind too far advanced to be influential. In one work he attacked the absurdity of image worship, in a second judicial dueling, in another the witchcraft superstition, and the idea that destructive phenomena like lightning and hail, then generally attributed to Satan, as prince of the power of the air, were anything but effects of natural causes. The title of saint was accorded by orthodoxy to a vigorous opponent of Judaism and heresy; the pseudonym of a learned and ingenious bishop attracted the smiling admiration of those few who read them, until the pernicious superstitions against which they were directed had worked out their own destruction in another way.

Freedom of Thought in England.

BY R. B. KERR.

In Lucifer No. 764, under the heading, "A Straw," there were some remarks which were decidedly misleading.

A quotation was given from the Rev. W. H. Wise, as to the successes of municipal socialism in West Ham, England. The remark was then added that it was this same West Ham which lately excluded the "Freethinker" and other Freethought papers from its municipal reading room.

If the bringing together of these two facts had any object at all, that object pretty clearly was to convey an impression that places advanced in municipal socialism were backward in freedom of thought. But unfortunately no cases were mentioned of cities backward in municipal socialism which do admit the "Freethinker" to their reading rooms. I have been in many municipal reading rooms in England, but the "Freethinker" was not to be found in any of them. The fact that the question came up at all in West Ham showed that the place was unusually radical.

The article was also very misleading, because it took the treatment of the "Freethinker" as a test of the public attitude towards freedom of thought. To show that this was no test at all, I shall simply cite a few hard facts.

In my own city of Edinburgh there are three daily papers, and all three are written from the secularist standpoint. For many years they have all flourished exceedingly. Over and over again attempts have been made to run a paper expressing the sentiments of the churchy people, but all such attempts have ended in financial disaster.

No members of the present House of Commons stand higher in public estimation than John Morley and W. E. H. Lecky, two eminent freethinkers. Morley first gained notoriety by spelling the name of God with a small "g," and, although he has dropped that habit now, he has never pretended to change his opinions in any way. He entered Parliament in 1883, and in 1886 he became a Cabinet minister. I think there has been no other case in the nineteenth century of a man becoming a Cabinet minister within three years of entering Parliament. Some years ago Morley was energetically boomed to succeed Gladstone as leader of the Liberal party, and his chief supporters were the religious people, who have long loved him in spite of his Agnosticism. But he was downed by the horse-racing section, who thought him too much of a saint to be of any use.

The effectual destruction of traditional theology was the work of one man, Charles Darwin. But when he died in 1882, the whole people demanded that he should have a national funeral in Westminster Abbey; and Grant Allen has told us how, "with noble inconsistency," the great preachers and church dignitaries of the country gathered round the grave of the man whose doctrines many of them had denounced as ruinous to the human soul.

The present Archbishop of Canterbury is a disciple of Darwin, and some of the great religious leaders, like Henry Drummond, have been enthusiastic Darwinians.

Let any candid person look through all the leading magazines and weeklies of England, and say whether there is one of them in which the theologian gets a fairer field than the secularist.

In 1895 Frederick Engels wrote that "agnosticism, though not yet considered 'the thing' quite as much as the Church of England, is yet very nearly on a par, as far as respectability goes, with Baptism, and decidedly ranks above the Salvation Army." Good judges agree with me that Engels was quite wrong in placing the Baptists as high in respectability as the Agnostics. There is no doubt that Agnosticism comes next to the Church of England, Roman Catholicism, and Theosophy, in point of respectability.

Yet, in the face of all the above facts, it is certain that the English people are down on such papers as the "Freethinker." But their hostility has no connection with freedom of thought. They are down on such papers, not because they are considered irreligious, but because they are considered "vulgar." While the English are the most perfect freethinkers on earth, they are fanatics on the subject of "good taste." Julian Ralph, an American writing in "Harper's," says that "the typical Englishman pretends nothing, boasts of nothing, thrusts nothing on anyone." Thrusting nothing on anyone, he extremely dislikes those who try to thrust anything on him. He likes to read an advanced article when he is in the mood for it, but he does not like people who are always harping on one string. Such publications as the "Christian Herald," the "War Cry," and the "Freethinker," are his pet abominations. Moreover, while he does not care much what you say, he cares very much how you say it. To ridicule or caricature the sincere beliefs of anybody is to him a very grave offense against good taste.

Above all, the Englishman draws a broad distinction between theology and the Church. He does not care a straw whether the clergyman preaches theism, theosophy, spiritualism, or agnosticism; for he finds that he can sleep through all those subjects equally well. Most educated Englishmen would make little opposition to the proposal of W. T. Stead that all tests should be abolished, and the pulpits of the Church made as open to the Theosophist, the Spiritualist, and the Agnostic by law, as they already are in reality. But as for abolishing the Church, they would no more think of that than they would think of abolishing the Derby horse race. Their most precious possessions are their old cathedrals, gray with the dust of a thousand years, and their stained glass windows each connected with some historic association. The finest pictures in their National Gallery have religious themes, and the churches provide the best music free of charge. The Presbyterians are for ever branded as an inferior race, because they destroyed a number of Church windows in Scotland three hundred years ago. But Darwin was a gentleman, for he only shattered beliefs, and respected windows.

Many eminent Agnostics, like Matthew Arnold and Froude the historian, have been as loyal to the Church as the most earnest believer. The secularization of the English Church is almost an accomplished fact, but I believe that a thousand years from today it will still be the Church of England.

The quarrel between the "Freethinker" and the English people is a quarrel about taste, not about truth.

Progress in Women's Dress.

BY AMY LASCETT.

I suppose every woman is interested in the question of dress, even when she wishes it required less of her thoughts, so it is needless to say that I devoured Giotto's letter in No. 764. Incidentally, I may mention that Giotto's letters are read before almost anything else.

Giotto is perhaps a trifle pessimistic in the matter of woman's dress. I admit that a few years back some few women wore bloomers when wheeling, but the number was small and most of the costumes were undoubtedly ugly.

Then the bloomer passed, but not before a divided skirt had been invented which the most unprejudiced would admit is far more graceful on the wheel while permitting the same freedom of movement. I grant a knickerbocker suit for women would be more utilitarian, but I for one don't want to return to the bloomer.

Perhaps the proportion of women cyclists who wear this divided skirt to those who wear the ordinary circular one is not so great as in the days when bloomers were worn, but the actual number is far greater in this city. We have to remember that the first woman who took to the bicycle was looked upon as a very brazen woman indeed, while now it is quite the correct thing for even the most fashionable. Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that one sees numbers of skirts far too long for the comfort of their wearers. I admit the reaction in length last year, and the tendency to give up the divided skirt. This year there is no reaction, and a firm is advertising divided skirts, "the proper thing for diamond frame," while any observer can count on even a short ride at least a half dozen women who look extremely well on diamond frame wheels in well-shaped divided skirts.

As to length, that has been a matter of experiment. I myself have lengthened one or two skirts, because I have found that to be satisfactory a skirt must come well below the bend of the knee in riding. Naturally as I believe in rational dress I want the skirt as short as possible, but I have found by experiment a length which suits me, and that I mean to keep.

In this city the number of women century riders is considerable. Now we may believe the century ride to be pernicious, but we must admit that the woman who survives will not be the one who rides a drop frame wheel in an ankle length skirt as our English sisters do. The spirit of emulation if nothing else leads the woman who wishes to ride any distance to adopt a skirt which, while it might be improved, is still itself an improvement. The chances for reaction are still present but they seem to be steadily growing less.

I am frequently reminded—I ride a diamond frame wheel myself—of the old woman so fond of her Bible. One word struck her forcibly—"Mesopotamia." "Ah that's a blessed word." So is the word skirt here, for some of the skirts are really apologies, but still they are skirts, and a landlady here might be capable of refusing our custom if we wore bloomers, while the small boy and the idiot might make our life unbearable. I hear comments sometimes which are anything but pleasing. Of these I try to appear unconscious and only reply if I feel I shall not appear undignified thereby. On the other hand, sometimes the comments are meant for praise though one might prefer not to hear them.

As to the improvement in ordinary dress, I may say that last winter here skirts were sold as "rainy day" skirts, and many clearing the ground from four to six inches were were during snowy and wet weather. Nor do I think there was any thing but praise given to their introduction, and I hope next winter to see a considerable increase in the number of women who will wear a short skirt in bad weather.

In conclusion of this subject, what room have men to find fault when they are so hidebound by fashion. What man will wear a straw hat—whatever the weather—before "the others" do. Even friends of mine who are theoretically believers in rational dress would object to going out with a woman so dressed, while the sex element comes in in their preference for petticoats, especially white ones, where their reason tells them they are unnecessary and unhealthful. Well, as Giotto says, everything will follow, even, some day, admiration.
